[14] This is given, for example, by the interpretation of the Italian survey of priests (Il Sacerdozio ministeriale, Problemi del Clero in Italia, Editrice Studium [1970]); Simmel, Priester zwischen Anpassung und Unterscheidung, 147: "The encyclical Sacerdotalis Caelibatus was virtually not read; what happened was that it was criticized rather than studied."

[15] Cf. also the general bibliography for the chapter.

The effort to represent such demands, especially the specifically professional, more effectively, to find solidarity for episcopally disapproved experiments in liturgy and pastoral care, or even to effect changes of awareness in favor of ecclesiastical or political reforms, was the basis on which, from the beginning of 1968, priest groups appeared in various European countries. To be sure, in ARTICLE 7 of the decree on priests the council had obliged the bishops to establish a Priests' Senate,[17] representing the presbyterium of the diocese, and in many countries this directive of the council had already been complied with. But the Priests' Senates found their place and field of activity only slowly among the existing and canonically firmly established advisory bodies of the dioceses. In any event, they proved to be unsuited to parry and overcome the unrest in the clergy. The priest groups appearing at the same time proceeded partly from older informal discussion groups and communities of priests or were founded on the basis of concrete opportunities, such as the encyclical Humanae vitae in the summer of 1968. With surprising rapidity there arose organized associations and principle papers on the diocesan level, but also [16] There was a broad discussion on these subjects at the conference of delegates of European priest groups from 5 to 10 July 1969 at Chur: Holenstein, Churer Dokumente.

[17] "They [the bishops] should be glad to listen to them [the priests], should even ask their advice and discuss with them what the care of souls demands and what promotes the welfare of the see. But in order to do this, a circle or council of priests should be created in a manner suited to today's circumstances and requirements, who would represent the presbyterium, whose form and norms must still be canonically determined. This council can effectively support the bishop in the government of the diocese with its advice" (Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil 3, 175ff.).

supranational contacts.[18] Various "solidarity groups" from West German dioceses amalgamated into a federation at Königstein on 26–27 May 1969 into the "Working Community of Priests' Groups in the German Federal Republic."

The priest groups in the various European nations had a different orientation conditioned by the political and inner-ecclesiastical situation.[19] The German SOG groups developed an overwhelmingly professionally specified goal, which was critical of the hierarchy. The Netherlands group Septuagint occupied an influential position in the contemporary development process of the Dutch Church. It was supported by broad strata of the clergy and faithful and had continuous contact with the Dutch bishops. The French groups, Concertation and especially Échanges et Dialogue, stood in an extraordinarily tense relation with the hierarchy. Still without prospects was the position of the Spanish and Portuguese groups in view of the contemporary political and inner-ecclesiastical circumstances in both nations.

The very differently structured and oriented European priest groups reached the apogee of their importance in 1969 when they met, so to speak, as a contrasting program to the contemporary episcopal symposium, at Chur[20] from 5 to 10 July, and, parallel to the Second Synod of Bishops, from 10 to 16 October at Rome,[21] for a "Conference of Delegates of European Priest Groups." On these occasions, the groups, their aims, and their style of procedure in regard to the bishops, going beyond all the usual amenities, became familiar to the public. At Chur the delegates demanded admittance to the episcopal symposium, which had chosen as its theme "The function of the priest today." But the bishops refused to admit the priests' representatives; there were indeed contacts on the periphery, some informal talks between individual bishops and delegates of the priests. And it may be said that the consultations of the bishops took place under the impression of the appearance and demands of the priest groups.

The Conference of Delegates of Priest Groups at Chur passed several resolutions, which were put together by the sharply antihierarchical French group, Échanges et Dialogue: the "Resolution on Work," "Resolution on Celibacy," "Resolution on the Commitment of Priests." In addition there were a text on "The Permanent and the Changing in the Episcopal Office in the Church," which presented a reply to the talk of Cardinal Döpfner on the same subject to the episcopal symposium, and a letter "To our Brother in Peter's Office, Paul VI."

---

[18] Development and activity of the priest groups are reflected in their publications, in Germany especially in Imprimatur (Trier) and SOG-Papiere (Bochum) (cf. the bibliography for the chapter).

[19] On the different orientation of the European priest groups: Werners, Jahrbuch für christliche Sozialwissenschaften 12 (1971), 187f.

[20] On the conference of delegates at Chur and its proclamations: Holenstein, ed., Churer Dokumente; idem, Der Protest der Priester; Raske-Schäfer-Wetzel, Eine freie Kirche für eine freie Welt, 55–72.

[21] On the conference of delegates at Rome: Raske-Schäfer-Wetzel, op. cit., 83–177.

Three months later in Rome the next conference of delegates, on the occasion of the Synod of Bishops, wanted to be received by Paul VI, but the Pope refused. The conference, in the rooms of the Waldensian faculty, worked for a theological elaboration of the priests' insecurity as to role but was under stronger internal tensions than the meeting at Chur. There appeared only "study documents" of which it was said[22]: "The texts are not accepted in all individual formulations, they are not regarded as definitive statements but as the point of departure for new reflections." The themes were: "On the Local Church," "On the Bishop," "On the Petrine Ministry," "A Church for the World," "Ministry of the Priest."[23]

It seems that with these two large conferences of 1969 the Priest-Group Movement had already exceeded its high point. The European groups were themselves aware that they had got themselves too much entangled in a—partly only due to prevailing circumstances—class problem. The radical attempts at a public overcoming of these problems aroused only in passing the interest of the ecclesiastical and nonecclesiastical public, did not further assist those immediately concerned, and at times gave the impression of a new "left" clericalism. And so the organizers of the "Congress of Priestly Solidarity" at Amsterdam from 28 September to 3 October 1970 sought for ways to a new contact with the people and the world.[24] The meeting had as its theme "Church in Society," and non-European, especially South American, priest groups were also invited. But the course of the congress revealed an internal discord and a considerable difference of opinion between the European groups, hitherto predominantly concerned with questions of class, and the Latin Americans, arguing from a political revolutionary standpoint. And there was disappointment over the slight public interest. Where, at the congresses in Chur and Rome, throngs full of expectation had prevailed, now sizeable holes gaped: on the press benches. Not only for the press but also for the organizers themselves there was missing in Amsterdam the program of contrast to a meeting of bishops.

---

[22] SOG-Papiere 1969, no. 5 (25 November 1969), 29.

[23] The report in the SOG-Papiere 1969, no. 5, 24–43, and Raske-Schäfer-Wetzel, Eine Freie Kirche für eine freie Welt, from p. 83, give no ultimate clarity as to exactly what the titles of the texts are and by how many delegates the individual texts were accepted.

[24] The SOG-Papiere 1970, 342–57, reports in detail on the congress at Amsterdam, with facsimile printing of press articles.

If in 1971 it was still written concerning the priest groups that they were "a reality no longer to be imagined as nonexistent," which made up 10 to 15 percent of the diocesan clergy,[25] that was already outdated at that time. The priest groups and their publication organs either disbanded expressly on their own or they quietly discontinued their work. Some still vegetated for a while without attracting attention. More enduring than these progressive groups were the traditionalist priest groups that arose or revived as a reaction, for example, the "Movement for Pope and Church," which found its adherents predominantly in the middle and older generations of the clergy.

If one asks about the reasons for this rapid end of an awakening that was so energetically pursued, there must be named, apart from the too wide spectrum in views and goals, which became apparent in the large gatherings, an inadequate theological basis and argumentation, an appearance unbalanced by inner insecurity and marked by the sociological orientation of those years. For the too highly set reform aims and the growing flood of proposals and contributions to discussions the organization and the material basis of the groups proved to be inadequate.[26] The leading forces in these groups were not rarely priests who were themselves unsure in their role or were even stuck in an acute vocation crisis. Because of apostasies, numerous groups lost their initiators and leading minds.

The bishops met the inner insecurity and external solidarity in the clergy, at times under antihierarchical signs, totally unexpectedly and unprepared. How did the papacy and the territorial episcopates react? The gamut extended, at first, from surprised nervousness by way of helplessly watching patience to the attempt at open dialogue with the priests on the edges of the conferences at Chur and Rome. A cautious reserve in regard to the priest groups was forced on the bishops by the fact that, for example, the "SOG papers" of the German and Austrian priest groups published numerous cases of conflict of individual priests with their bishops, dramatically arranged as "documentation," and in so doing gave publicity to personal letters of the bishops to individual priests.

The German bishops made a very early theological contribution of high quality to the overcoming of the priests' crisis by the doctrinal letter on the priestly office[27] issued at their plenary meeting on 11 November 1969. In a biblical and dogmatic consideration the bishops sought to clarify what had become unsure: the understanding of the office of priest based on the New Testament and developed in the history of the Church. This document of the German bishops was of importance for the choice of themes and the course of the Third Synod of Bishops at Rome in 1971. "The Priestly Ministry" was one of its chief themes. The document issued by this Synod, "The Office of Priest," was decisively stamped by Cardinal Höffner and Hans Urs von Balthasar. It led beyond the biblical-dogmatic consideration to a statement on the basic questions of priestly ministry and priestly life.[28]

---

[25] Thus Werners, Priestergruppen, 202.

[26] In almost every fascicle of the SOG-Papiere occurs the complaint of being unable to master the organizational problems, especially the flood of paper.

[27] Schreiben der deutschen Bischöfe über das priesterliche Amt. Eine biblisch-dogmatische Handreichung (Trier 1969).

Parallel to these exertions for a theological and spiritual mastering of the crisis of the priesthood proceeded the attempt at an inventory carried out by sociological methods. Even if the priest groups with their radical programs represented only a minority, in the years after the close of the Second Vatican Council it became in general ever clearer that the clergy no longer constituted a closed unity among themselves and with the bishops. The uncertainty in regard to this phenomenon offered to some territorial episcopates the occasion to permit or even to commission surveys or inquiries among their priests by scholarly institutes employing the methods of the public-opinion poll.[29] From 1969 to 1972 such inquiries, more or less simultaneously but independent of one another, took place in the Netherlands, the German Federal Republic, Italy, Austria, Switzerland, Spain, and the United States. Not counting the Netherlands, about 43 percent of the Catholic priests of the world were affected by this wave of interrogation.[30] Since these inquiries were variously accented and carried out by different methods, did not take place at exactly the same time, and were colored by the ecclesiastical and political context in the different countries, a comprehensive comparison of them is not without problems. Nevertheless definite common tendencies and also regional differences are clearly visible.

The questions which were submitted to the priests referred first to the background, development, and living conditions of priests. Precisely in this area considerable differences appeared among the individual countries. A second series of questions dealt with the functions of the priest and the difficulties connected with them. Understanding of function and calling, spiritual life, and celibacy constituted a third complex, with which finally was closely associated the relationship of the priests to the Church and the authorities. The outcome of the interrogations operated on the one hand in a sobering and at the same time calming manner after the shocking rise of the priest groups. Seventy-nine percent of the German priests declared, for example, that they were content, or even very content, with their activity of the moment; 12 percent answered "pretty well," and only 5 percent were not especially, or not at all, satisfied.[31] To be sure, 51 percent of the German priests declared it necessary or worthy of consideration that obligation to celibacy be abolished in the future, but 59 percent had no hesitation, despite the celibacy obligation, in advising young men to the priestly calling.[32] On the other hand, there could no longer be overlooked what people had long not been ready to admit: "The priesthood is not monolithic, a broad spectrum of pastoral and theological positions is recognizable, and hence an inner-ecclesiastical tension, which appears to some as fatal, to others as a sign of hope. There is hardly a question of fundamental importance any more on which priests would be of one opinion and on which they would not express themselves very clearly in one sense or another."[33] Despite a certain difference, which stands out in Europe somewhat between the upset situation in the Netherlands via Germany and Austria to the still more stable ecclesiastical situation in Switzerland, the inquiries made clear uniform trends: An increasing stratum of younger priests in Europe and the United States is critical of the "vertical" understanding of the priestly office and bases the priestly ministry not so much in relation to sacramental priestly ordination as a result of preaching and the administration of the sacraments, as rather "horizontal-functional" in the sense of a service to mankind and to the unity of the congregation. With this understanding of the office is united the rejection of a special priestly state, clerical dress, and the joining of the priestly office and obligatory celibacy, which is found to be not adequately based theologically and burdensome. Even more definitely than the demand for the "uncoupling" of priesthood and obligatory celibacy was the demand for the admission of proved married men to the priesthood—not only by the younger priests but, for example, in Germany by 79 percent of all priests.[34] With this notion of the office and of the appropriate manner of life of the priest there was joined in the younger clergy a critical attitude toward ecclesiastical authority and its carrying out of its office, the demand that priests and lay persons take part in the calling of the holders of office, just as an extensive collaboration in pastoral work and the leading of the community be intended for the laity in general.

---

[28] J. Höffner, H. Urs von Balthasar, eds., Bischofssynode 1971. Das Priesteramt (Einsiedeln 1972).

[29] Report of research and literature in the bibliography for the chapter.

[30] Simmel reaches this evaluation in Forster, ed., Priester zwischen Anpassung und Unterscheidung, 127.

---

[31] Schmidtchen, Priester in Deutschland, 76–81.

[32] Ibid., 66–76.

[33] Ibid., XII.

[34] Ibid., 69. Similar or even stronger desires resulted from the surveys in other countries.

Other results of the surveys were conditioned by regional peculiarities: In Austria and Switzerland 60 to 70 percent of the priests obtained their education in ecclesiastical boarding schools, in Italy and Spain the percentage must have been still higher. In Germany, on the other hand, 65 percent of the priests spent their school years at home and attended public schools. But it is striking that just in the first named countries their formation was felt by the priests as insufficient and the demand for a more qualified improvement was clearly raised. Generally widespread was the demand for specialization in priestly activity and supplementary secondary studies. The special political situation of Spain in the late Franco epoch was reflected in statements of the Spanish priests on Church-state relations.[35]

The temporary keystone in the great chain of inquiry was constituted by the inquiry among the German priesthood candidates in 1974.[36] The results make known how even in a brief period of time not unessential nuances can occur: "One can neither speak of a return to conservatism nor of a continuation of a generally critical trend. Instead, something new, perhaps unexpected, happens. In their open, partly critical attitude the priesthood candidates are much like the young priests—in general, they entirely resemble them rather than the older ones. But then the new must be noticed: a different, perhaps strengthened drive toward spirituality. Among the authenticating ideas of the candidates there are clearly prominent the concepts of being borne by Christ's commission and of the personal relation to God. This is expressed not only in this question about the authenticating of the office but also in numerous other connections."[37]

With this a last and decisive effect of the crisis of the priesthood is touched: the insecurity and decimation of the recruits for the priesthood. Parallel to the forming of solidarity groups of younger priests there occurred in European and American countries a convulsion of the previous system of seminary education and theological studies.[38] Everywhere the number of priesthood candidates dropped strongly, so that not a few diocesan seminaries and religious houses of studies had to close. In particular, the externally strictly isolated manner of life of the seminaries could not be maintained. Seminarians demanded the possibility of being permitted to live individually or in groups in the midst of the other students in their places of study. The previous curriculum of theological studies, the narrow Neo-Scholastic dogmatic theology, the unconnected juxtaposition of theological disciplines in the program of studies, the unsatisfactory inclusion of didactic-pedagogical and pastoral-practical disciplines, were perceived as inadequate for the preparation for priestly and other pastoral ministries, especially as soon the number of students, even of females, increased, who began a study of theology without the intention of becoming priests. The education of such students, for example, in Germany, for a chiefly professional career as teachers of religion, demanded the development of corresponding programs of study and organization of examinations, which were included in the framework of the formation of other teachers.

---

[35] Especially Simmel tries to trace common trends and differences in the results of the inquiries (Forster, ed., Priester zwischen Anpassung und Unterscheidung, 127–48).

[36] G. Schmidtchen, Umfrage unter Priesteramtskandidaten (Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1974).

[37] Ibid., 1.

[38] A first inventory on the question of priestly formation occurred at the beginning of 1966 on the occasion of a broadcast series of West German radio: L. Waltermann, Klerus zwischen Wissenschaft und Seelsorge (Essen 1966). The discussion of the reform proposals for the formation of priests and the study of theology which has since taken place is hardly comprehensible. The efforts for the reform of the study of theology in Germany were expressed in the previous five fascicles SKT=Studium Katholische Theologie, Berichte-Analysen-Vorschläge, edited by the commission "Curricula in Theologie" of

The concern for a reorganization of the seminary education of priests and of theological studies had already occupied the Second Vatican Council. The decree Optatam totius on the formation of priests, of 28 October 1965, was characterized by some, chiefly the Protestant observers at the council,[39] as one of the most productive and important conciliar texts. In balanced instructions the way was pointed to a reform of priestly formation and, for the first time with this clarity, the value of human maturity and the properties of character esteemed by people in prospective priests was stressed. In the discussions it became clear that the demands for a reform of priestly education were very different in the several continents and countries. And so the council decided on an incisive shifting of competencies in the area of priestly formation: no longer the curial Congregation of Studies and Seminaries, but the episcopal conferences should in the future have the legislative competence for this sphere. "Hence for individual peoples and rites a proper 'order of priestly formation' should be introduced. It is to be set up by the episcopal conference, reviewed from time to time, and approved by the Apostolic See. In it the general laws should be so adapted to the special local and temporal circumstances that the formation of priests the West German Faculty Meeting by E. Feifel (Zurich, Einsiedeln, and Cologne 1973–75).

---

[39] Thus by O. Cullmann and J. C. Hampe in A. Arens, Priesterausbildung und Theologiestudium (=Nachkonz. Dokumentation 25), 5.

may always correspond to the pastoral demands of the countries in which the priests have to exercise their ministry."[40]

In 1966–67 Cardinal Garrone, prefect of the Congregation of Studies and Seminaries, in four circulars admonished the chairmen of the episcopal conferences to carry out this mandate quickly.[41] However, many episcopal conferences were taken unawares by the reorganization in the training of priests and were in no position to achieve a required reorganization in the brief time, so that it was possible only to attempt national educational organizations.[42] Hence on the occasion of the First Synod of Bishops in 1967 Cardinal Garrone arranged for a Ratio Fundamentalis, a framework for the education of priests throughout the world. In it lay the danger that the Congregation of Studies and Seminaries would again take over the competence which the council had just granted to the episcopal conferences. However, the Ratio Fundamentalis Institutionis Sacerdotalis of 6 January 1970,[43] essentially elaborated by the Italian Jesuit Paolo Dezza, the Spanish diocesan priest Germano Martil, and the German Benedictine Abbot Augustinus Meyer, avoided this danger. It produced an orientation framework for the legislation of the episcopal conferences with a proposal in examples and preformulations, which took none of their competence from the bishops. When the reform of priestly formation was perceived as urgent under the pressure of contemporary circumstances, the determination showed that the episcopal conferences within a year should draw up a Ratio Nationalis and submit it to the congregation for approval.

With all the imperfections and the marks of haste which adhere to the Ratio Fundamentalis, it must as a whole be regarded as a positive framework for priestly education outlined against the background of the situation existing in many countries. In content it follows the schema of the decree Optatam totius and is concerned with the pastoral theology of the clerical vocation, seminaries and their direction, the candidates for the priesthood, their human, spiritual, scholarly, and pastoral formation, as well as with the continuing education of the priests after their seminary days. The necessity of some continuing professional training was at this time definitely demanded in the survey of priests by priests of Latin countries, formed in a narrow Neo-Scholasticism and exclusively educated in isolated seminaries, and it constituted one of the central points of the program of the priest groups of Europe and South America. The delay of a year, determined in the Ratio Fundamentalis, for the setting up of regional or territorial organizations of priestly formation was not to be observed for the reason that not only the territorial episcopates but also others who were to take part—regents, directors of boarding schools, professors—had to prepare for a cooperation and finally for an agreement. The work on the Rationes Nationales was not finished in a moment. The consolidation made clear in the survey of the candidates in the German Federal Republic in 1974 allowed like tendencies to be assumed in the younger clergy. The acute crisis seemed to be followed by a phase of sober seeking. It would be a fallacy to assume that the development would quickly lead back to the interior and exterior uniformity characteristic of the clergy in the first half of this century.

---

[40] Optatam totius, no. 1 in Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil 2, 315ff.

[41] A. Arens, op. cit., 5–66 describes the efforts for a reform of the formation of priests down to the Ratio Fundamentalis of 6 January 1970.

[42] Very noteworthy attempts of this sort by the German bishops' conference are given in "Neuordnung der theologischen Studien für Priesteramtskandidaten" (1968) and "Leitlinien für die Priesterausbildung" (1970), Priesterausbildung und Theologiestudium, 541–63, and 265–77.

[43] AAS 62(1970), 321–84; Priesterausbildung und Theologiestudium, 68–263.

This insight must have been the occasion for the traditionalist groups in the clergy, especially for the movement around the former missionary Bishop Marcel Lefebvre, to forcibly bring about this uniformity in the education, theology, spirituality, and discipline of priests by a return to old forms and with radical means. In this connection Lefebvre appeals, not without reason, to Pius X and the struggle of this Pope against the dangers of Modernism and its reform efforts. As the investigation of this anti-Modernist struggle, intensively pursued in the last years, shows, it indeed suppressed Modernism but did not master the problem inherent in it. To an even stronger degree can the anti-Modernism of today's traditionalist groups prove itself to be a way of error.

CHAPTER 11

*Religious Communities and Secular Institutes

The Orders between Persistence and Change

The history of religious institutes of the nineteenth century was characterized by the unanticipated resurgence of the old orders and the founding of many new congregations. When the First World War broke out, this period drew to a close. Most religious institutes had been consolidated and found their manner of life and field of action, and there began for them a period of unforeseen growth. In the years 1920–

---

* Viktor Dammertz, O.S.B.

60 almost all religious communities experienced a hitherto unprecedented influx of novices. This extraordinarily strong accumulation was certainly conditioned also by external factors—the world economic crisis with massive unemployment; inadequate possibilities for education and professional goals outside the monastery, especially for women. This explains also the relatively high number of departures during the time of probation. Nevertheless, in the case of most of the young people who decided for the religious life, this choice was based on religious motives. Readiness for commitment to the Church and for service to people, as well as concern for the salvation of one's soul, were an effective motive in the decision for the religious vocation.

The end of the First World War presented the communities with a new situation: the peace treaties altered the map of Europe. Because of this, the institutes were compelled to adapt their own structures to the new boundaries; in particular, the national states just established were not pleased that their religious should be directly subject to foreign tribunals. On the other hand, the events of the war contributed to a destruction of the state-Church system and of some laws hostile to the Church, so that now also for the orders previously existing legal restrictions and state regulations disappeared. The great misery which the First World War left and which was intensified by the subsequent economic crisis meant a challenge for the institutes, especially in the social and charitable sphere. Not least due to the influx to the novitiates were the communities able to provide effective aid.

Within the Church the new Code of Canon Law meant some significant changes for the religious institutes.[1] They not only aimed at a generally welcomed simplification, at greater clarity and legal security, but they bore especially an emphatically pastoral, spiritual accent. The legislator had obviously striven to create a legal order which should facilitate an authentic religious life. Of course, this all-inclusive codification of the canons for religious also involved negative consequences. The prescriptions of the canons for religious, partly going into great detail, attempted, it is true, through repeated references to the particular law of the individual institutes, to take account of the variety of religious life, but nevertheless promoted a considerable thrust toward uniformity and the leveling of the religious life.[2] Since Canon

---

[1] A. Scharnagl, Das neue kirchliche Gesetzbuch, 2d ed. (Munich and Regensburg 1918), 61–70.

[2] This leveling had already become standard in the restoration of the nineteenth century; the individual institutes often differed more in the form of their habit and other externals than in their spirituality (R. Hostie, Vie et mort des ordres religieux [Paris 1972], 249–51, 264–73).

489 annulled all regulations of rules and statutes which were contrary to the norms of the code, the institutes were asked to adapt their constitutions to the new code, and, in making the necessary changes, to employ where possible the words of the code itself.[3] On 6 March 1921 the Congregation of Religious published norms for the formulation of the statutes of the new congregations, which also obtained great importance for the existing communities in the course of the revision of the constitutions.[4]

All these prescriptions confirmed the tendency already discernible under Leo XIII to centralize the structure of the religious life; in particular, the institutes of papal right should be united more closely to Rome.[5] The prescription proved to be especially harmful in the long run which required that the constitutions must contain neither historical references nor quotations from Scripture, the councils, the Fathers, or the works of other authors, and a fortiori no rather long ascetical directions, detailed spiritual admonitions, or mystical reflections. They should be confined instead to the canonical decisions on the special character of the respective institute, its aims and functions, on the essential content of the vows, on the acquiring and loss of membership, on the life-style of the religious, as well as on the government of the institute.[6] If brief spiritual texts were tolerated (and it must be admitted that these directions excluded really excessive and often very subjective and transient ascetical and edifying statements from the constitutions), this narrowing of the fundamental document of each institute favored a lasting codification of the institute's life, especially as it was no longer clear that the canonical decrees on the structure of religious life were derived from spiritual foundations. Also it could not fail to happen that the new statutes of many institutes in their structure and content looked very much alike and so the character of the individual institutes threatened more and more to disappear. This was true especially of the many congregations founded in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, which could not have recourse to one of the old religious rules. Their statutes were often enough not much more than a reproduction, only poorly accommodated to the current situation, of the model statutes provided by the Holy See as guidance.

---

[3] AAS 10(1918), 290, 13(1921), 538f.

[4] Ibid., 13(1921), 312–9; these norms extended back to a similar document of 1901, to which were appended even detailed model statements. In 1937 the Propaganda issued similar norms for the religious institutes subject to it (L.R. Ravasi, De Regulis et Constitutionibus Religiosorum [Rome, Tournai, and Paris 1958], 187–257).

[5] U. Stutz, Der Geist des Codex Iuris Canonici (Stuttgart 1918), 246–50.

[6] Normae, cap. IV–V in AAS 13(1921), 317f.

Still, many of the young people who entered the monastery found spiritual and religious security in the existing strict organization. Incorporation was facilitated for them by the patterns of religious life which were given to them. In the instructions of the novitiate more was said about constancy and submission, sacrifice and renunciation, obedience and confidence in the superiors than about innovation, self-development, and personal initiative, just as the Church itself proved to be very much an unshakable institution and guarantor of order and security in the breakdown of the period between the wars.

But developments in Church and society were not without their effects on monasteries. The liturgical movement and the striving for a piety nourished on Holy Scripture evoked disgust among religious with the prayer formulas and devotional exercises of some communities, as well as with the often very petty directives of a moral and ascetical character which governed the everyday life, especially of female religious, even in details, and left little room for personal responsibility. More and more the lack of a religious life directly oriented to the Bible was felt. Besides, religious in many countries saw themselves challenged by a growing secularization of public life and the alienation of many from the Church. Measures hostile to the Church, suppressions of monasteries, and open persecution presented existentially to the religious affected by them the question of their vocation. Religious often found themselves inadequately equipped for an intellectual confrontation with an environment which faced the Christian faith with indifference, rejection, or even hostility.

The Second World War and its consequences tore many institutes of men and women from their traditional organization and transplanted them to situations in which they had to come to independent decisions and prove themselves in their spiritual vocation without being able to count on leadership and guidance "from above."

The Rise of New Types of Communities

Against this background must be viewed the origin of new kinds of communities. As early as the turn of the century Charles de Foucauld (1858–1916) planned to establish a community of Little Brothers of Jesus that departed from the traditional structures. In the following years he sketched several rules but at his violent death he left behind no disciples. The seed he had scattered sprang up only later. In 1933 René Voillaume and some followers founded at El-Abiodh-Sidi-Cheikh on the edge of the Sahara the community of the Little Brothers of Jesus, which was recognized as a congregation of episcopal right in 1936 and in 1968 obtained a papal decree of approbation. The Little Brothers of Jesus live in brotherhoods of usually three to five members, preferably in environments which are not accessible to the Christian message or are entirely alienated from it. They want to attest the love of God less through preaching than through solidarity with the people among whom they live. Their model is Jesus, the worker of Nazareth. Their effort is to shun all division. And so they make themselves with their work a part of the occupational world of their neighborhood, live in small dwellings which are in keeping with the milieu, and extensively adjust themselves to their environment in the externals of life. Their spirituality is characterized by a piety which is nourished especially on the cult of the Eucharist and reflection on Scripture. Every brotherhood is directed by a "responsible person," and the entire congregation is subject to the superior general. According to the latest figures, the institute numbers sixty-eight fraternities, in which live 232 members, including sixty-four priests.[7] In the same spirit there arose in 1939 at Touggourt in the Sahara the community of the Little Sisters of Jesus, which was erected as a congregation of episcopal right in 1947 and in 1964 obtained a papal decree of commendation. To it belong 990 sisters in 212 communities.[8] These religious communities inspired by Foucauld's spirit differ from the traditional institutes especially through a strong emphasis on brotherhood, which should be experienced in the small community, the team, through a new interpretation and realization of poverty, which is understood as wholehearted common destiny with the strata of population oppressed by poverty with all their insecurity and lack of protection, and through their unobtrusive presence "in the heart of the masses" "in the midst of the world," where they intend to influence through nothing other than their exemplary Christian life. Later arose other communities, which likewise were oriented to Charles de Foucauld, as in 1956 the fraternity of the Brothers of the Virgin of the Poor, to whom the model for their contemplative life is Jesus, praying and doing penance in the desert, and the community of Little Brothers of the Gospel, erected as a congregation of episcopal right in 1968, who also wish to live among the poorest, not only to share their poverty in solidarity, but to preach the gospel to these poor.[9]

To live in the midst of the world is also the motto of the secular institutes, which in part already existed for a long time as "pious unions" or without any ecclesiastical approval, but only found their recognition as a canonical state of perfection through the apostolic constitution Provida Mater of Pius XII of 2 February 1947 and obtained their basic organization in the motu proprio Primo feliciter of 12 March 1948 and in the instruction of the Congregation of Religious of 19 March 1948.[10] It is proper to the secular institutes that their members live on principle in the midst of the world. By the character saecularis they are essentially distinguished from the religious state, the status religiosus, with which, however, the striving for perfection unites them in a form approved by the Church. The wearing of a religious habit, common life in community after the manner of the orders, and in general any approximation to the life-style of the religious communities, are not in accord with the essence of a secular institute. True, the members bind themselves to a life according to the evangelical counsels, not through official vows but through private promise, oath, or something similar. Even if in many of them there is often present the inclination to adapt themselves to the traditional communities in this or that form, and some institutes are still grappling with their profile,[11] they are clearly and consciously distinct from "religious" in their manner of life.[12]

---

[7] R. Voillaume, Mitten in der Welt (Freiburg 1960); LThK, 2d ed., VI, 329f.; Annuario Pontificio 1975, 1199.

[8] LThK, 2d ed., VI, 330; Annuario Pontificio 1975, 1252.

[9] "Une nouvelle forme de vie monastique. La Fraternité de la Vièrge des Pauvres," Rythmes du monde 10(1962), 207–15. Lecture of R. Voillaume before the Unio Superiorum generalium in November 1975 (unpublished).

Meanwhile, there are many secular institutes which were established by the bishops with Rome's Nihil obstat; six institutes of men and twenty-one of women have so far become of papal right.[13] The best known and most influential of them is the Opus Dei. Its male branch was founded in Spain in 1928 by the priest J.M. Escrivá de Balaguer (1902–75); on 24 February 1947, a few weeks after the appearance of Provida Mater, it was the first secular institute to obtain the papal decree of approval, and in 1950 it obtained definitive confirmation. This branch includes priests, who are united within the institute in the Societas Sacerdotalis Sanctae Crucis, and laymen, who, in accord with the statutes, must constitute the majority. The ordinary members, who must have had a complete theological program, if possible with a doctoral degree, and a broader, likewise complete training in another academic profession, as well as the "Oblates," in regard to whose education not such high claims are made, bind themselves by vows to a life according to the evangelical counsels. Even married men can be admitted as extraordinary members, who seek to realize the spirit of the evangelical counsels in a manner of life corresponding to their situation. For the rest, the members pursue their professions and exert themselves for the Christian permeation of the families, the working world, and public life. In general they are not to be known as members of the Opus Dei; usually they appear not as a group, but each works in his place in the sense of the institute, in regard to which a characteristic élite-awareness unites them. However, the institute also appears as performer of common tasks. Thus, it is responsible for the Catholic University of Navarre at Pamplona, founded in 1952 and erected by the Holy See in 1960; with its thirteen faculties and scholarly institutes it ranks as one of the best universities in Spain; a majority of professors belong to Opus Dei. Further, the institute supports centers of study and student homes in many university cities. Outside Spain, Opus Dei has spread to about fifty other countries, especially Italy, France, and Latin America. The prelature nullius of Yauyos in Peru is entrusted to the community of Priests of the Holy Cross. In admitting members, the institute makes no distinctions of class, but it appeals especially to intellectuals, and it is well known that members of Opus Dei occupy many important posts of the political, economic, and cultural life of Spain. The ensuing involvement in the affairs of daily politics, joined to a certain secretiveness, has led to serious attacks on the institute. In addition to the male branch, in 1930 a female branch, marked by the same spirit, was founded, which meanwhile has also obtained papal confirmation. It forms a special secular institute with independent organs of government, but is, however, subject to the president general. After the founder's death in 1975 the professor of canon law Alvaro del Portillo was elected second president general of Opus Dei.[14]

---

[10] AAS 39(1947), 114–24: 40(1948), 283–86, 293–97; cf. L. Beyer, De Institutis saecularibus documenta (Rome 1962).

[11] F. Wulf, Die Säkularinstitute nach dem Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzil (Meitingen and Freising 1968), 28f.

[12] But since they, like religious, are subject to the same Roman Congregation, the latter on the occasion of the reform of the Curia of 1967 was renamed and now is Sacra Congregatio pro Religiosis et Institutis saecularibus (SCRIS) (apostolic constitution Regimini Ecclesiae universae, ART. 71, AAS 59[1967], 912).

[13] H. A. Timmermann, Die Weltgemeinschaften im deutschen Sprachraum (Einsiedeln 1963); A. Wienand, ed., Das Wirken der Orden und Klöster in Deutschland II (Cologne 1964), 636–68; Annuario Pontificio 1975, 1200, 1325f. On 20 September 1970 there were twenty-one secular institutes of papal and seventy-nine of diocesan right, to which belonged 30,000 women, 3,000 priests, and 400 lay brothers as members. Opus Dei is not included in these statistics (Vita consecrata 7[1971], 151, n. 1).

The Acclimatization of the Orders in Mission Lands

New routes were also traveled in mission lands. In his encyclical Rerum Ecclesiae of 28 February 1926, Pope Pius XI appealed to missionaries to devote themselves more strongly to the Church's intimate relationship with these countries. He pushed not only for the training of native priests and catechists but also for the establishing of communities of male and female religious. True, he regarded it as legitimate for missionaries to admit candidates from mission lands into their own communities, but admonished the mission superiors: "Reflect without bias and conscientiously whether it would not be better to establish new religious communities which were more in accord with the concerns and interests of the natives as well as the local situation and special circumstances." He especially urged the founding of contemplative monasteries, from which he expected a fruitful influence on evangelization.[15] The missionary decree of the Second Vatican Council again underscored this instruction and pointed to the necessity of making the religious life indigenous in a form suited to the respective culture and circumstances of individual peoples (ARTICLE 18).

---

[14] O.B. Roegele, "Das 'Opus Dei.' Legende und Wirklichkeit einer umstrittenen Gemeinschaft," Hochland 54(1961–62), 430–39; HK 22(1968), 353f., 29(1975), 536. In the Annuario Pontificio 1975, 1200, Opus Dei is given as a secular institute, although

Even if there were previously, especially in Asia, several congregations of native sisters, their number increased quickly after the appearance of the mission encyclical. It grew in Africa between 1920 and 1960 from nine to seventy-nine, although here at first great obstacles rooted in the tribal idea had to be overcome. For the ideal of the celibate life was at first totally foreign to the African mentality: a woman and her dowry were regarded as part of the wealth of her tribe, and the tribe to which she was turned over on the occasion of the marriage treasured her especially as mother of the children which she bore for the tribe. Only slowly did an understanding of the ideal of the religious life for the woman grow. The low educational status of many girls, due to the nonexistent school system, meant further impediment, especially in view of the independence of these African communities. In Asia, however, the presuppositions were much more favorable. In regard to the native applicants for the priesthood the missionaries in Asia generally preferred an integration into their own community. The cultural level of these countries facilitated such a common life. Even in Africa some of the missionary religious institutes chose this route, for example, the Holy Ghost Fathers, the Oblates of the Immaculate Virgin, the Franciscans; on the other hand, the efforts of the institutes founded exclusively for the mission, such as the White Fathers and Mill Hill Missionaries, were chiefly concentrated on the training of an it allegedly no longer regards itself as such, in any case it obviously no longer collaborates with the other secular institutes (Vita consecrata 7[1971], 32, n. 5).

---

[15] AAS 18(1926), 77–79.

African diocesan clergy, an attitude which was for a long time intentionally fostered by the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.[16]

The appeal of Pius XI for the founding of contemplative monasteries at first found no very loud echo. The mission superiors were especially concerned to gain native collaborators in the pastoral, social and charitable, and educational sphere. Only after the Second World War and especially after the Second Vatican Council did the number of contemplative foundations greatly increase. Up to 1968 their number in Africa alone rose to twenty-seven monasteries of men and sixty-two of women. Whereas these houses of men all follow the Benedictine Rule—Benedictines, Cistercians, Trappists—among the houses of women, besides twenty modeled on the Benedictine type, ten convents of Poor Clares and seventeen of Carmelites are counted. In addition there are various other monasteries of women, seven fraternities of the Little Brothers and forty-four of the Little Sisters of Jesus, as well as one fraternity each of the Little Brothers of the Virgin of the Poor and of the Little Sisters of the Most Sacred Heart.[17] For the support and promotion of the Benedictine foundations in the Third World there arose at Vanves near Paris the Secrétariat de l'aide à l'implantation monastique (A.I.M.), which in 1973 took care of a total of sixty African, fifty-three Asian, ninety-one Latin American, and ten Oceanian monasteries of monks and nuns.[18] For a comprehensive exchange of views and experiences on the problems of the monastic life in the Third World, the superiors and superioresses of Africa met at Bouaké, Gold Coast, in 1964 and at Rome in 1966, those of Asia at Bangkok in 1968, and those of Latin America at Rio de Janeiro in 1972 and at Bogotá in 1975.[19]

The strivings to make the religious life indigeneous in these lands and to accommodate it to the local situations proved to be difficult. The first experiments in this area were planned and implemented by Europeans. Only the native religious succeeded by patient work in discovering an organic and enduring adaptation in fidelity both to the essential elements of the Christian religious life as well as to the cultural heritage of their own people.[20]

---

[16] Cf. W. Henkel, "Congregazioni autoctone," DIP II, 1588–93; J. Casier, "Africa," DIP I, 130–40; P. Tchao Yun-Koen, "Cina," DIP II, 1026–8.

[17] DIP I, 137; on Carmel in the mission cf. DIP II, 451f.

[18] Secrétariat de l'aide à l'implantation monastique, "Monastic Growth," 1973 supplement to 1970 handbook.

[19] Detailed report in Rythmes du monde 13(1965), no. 1/2; 14(1966), no. 4; 16(1968), no. 4; 17(1969), no. 1/2; Bulletin de l'A.I.M. no. 9(1969), 7–27, no. 15(1973), 7–22, no. 19(1975), 7–21.

Religious Reform under Pius XII

In the congregations of the new type and the secular institutes it was believed that the goal sought could not be realized in the traditional structures of religious life. New routes were sought for shaping the life in accord with the evangelical counsels in a contemporary form. Meanwhile, however, there was no lack of reform plans and desires in the existing orders. However, it was in accord with reality that these were discussed in small groups of members of the orders and were not given wide publicity. It was Pope Pius XII, who as early as the first months of his pontificate, but especially from the end of the Second World War, made the accommodata renovatio, the renewal in accord with the times, of religious life an essential point of the program of his pontificate. This renewal should likewise be marked by fidelity to the traditional heritage as well as by courage for wise adaptation. In his talks and letters to individual religious communities he returned again and again to this great concern.[21] The papal directives make clear that they aimed to regulate a process of fermentation which was meanwhile under way in many religious communities and was especially spelled out in some general chapters. The Pope strongly emphasized the obligation not to attack the essentials of religious life and of the particular institute[22] and not to be unduly influenced by the current views and opinions.[23]

The Roman Congregation of Religious took up the aim of renewal of religious life in accord with the time when, for the first time in history, in the Holy Year 1950 it convened at Rome an International Congress for (male) Religious, which dealt in many lectures and reports with the accommodata renovatio statuum perfectionis. This general theme was discussed in three subdivisions in regard to the life and claustral discipline of religious, their formation and instruction, and their apostolic work.[24] Two years later a Congress of Superioresses General took place at Rome,[25] which also treated of the question of reform of the institutes, as did the "Second General Congress on the Timely Renewal of the States of Perfection," which the Congregation of Religious summoned to Rome in 1957 and planned under the energetic guidance of the then secretary, A. Larraona (1887–1973).[26]

---

[20] "Einheimische Schwestern und Brüder in Afrika," Pro mundi vita, Centrum informationis, Heft 15 (Brussels 1966); D. Plum, "Sind Mönche in Afrika ein Fremdkörper?" HK 28(1974), 494–97.

[21] The earlier documents are collected in extracts in Acta et documenta Congressus generalis de statibus perfectionis I (Rome 1952), 3–49; J. Zürcher, Päpstliche Dokumente zur Ordensreform (Einsiedeln 1954); cf. D.M. Huot, "Summus Pontifex Pius XII et accommodata renovatio in statibus perfectionis," Apollinaris 32(1959), 360–68; A. Scheuermann, "Die Ordensleute in den Dokumenten des Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzils," AkathKR 134(1965), 337–40.

[22] Thus, for example, in his talk to the Jesuits on 17 September 1946: "Ante omnia oportet Constitutionibus vestris et universis earundem praescriptis firme fideles sitis. Instituta Ordinis vestri possunt, si id congruens esse videatur, ad nova temporis adiuncta hic illic immutando accommodari; attamen quod praecipuum in iis est, nequaquam tangatur perpetuumque consistat" (AAS 38[1946], 383).

[23] Cf. Address to the superiors general of 11 February 1958 in AAS 50(1958), 153–61.

From these large congresses proceeded the stimulus for a closer collaboration of the orders, whether on the national or the international plane. In many countries appeared conferences of superiors of the male and the female institutes, which were officially recognized by the Holy See and erected as institutions of papal right.[27] On the international level were held the Unio Superiorum generalium (USG) for male religious in 1957 and the Unio internationalis Superiorissarum generalium (UISG) for female religious in 1965, both of which took place at Rome. In addition there appeared in 1959 the Confoederatio Latino-Americana Religiosorum (CLAR) with headquarters in Bogotá, which as the umbrella association of all orders on that continent acquired great significance subsequently, especially as partner of the Latin American Episcopal Conference (CELAM).[28]

Even before the first international congress met, the Pope undertook a partial reform. On 21 November 1950 he published the apostolic constitution Sponsa Christi on nuns, which was followed two days later by directives for its implementation from the Congregation of Religious.[29] Entirely in the spirit of the papal reform program, these documents first underscored the unalterability of the contemplative life, the propriety of solemn vows, and the unrenounceable papal enclosure for all nuns. However, in adaptation to new requirements the rules on enclosure were modified, namely, by the creation of the so-called little papal enclosure, which permitted a meeting of nuns and outsiders in an area of the enclosure that was intended for work directed to the outside. The obligation to a proper, productive work was stressed. True, a high apostolic value was acknowledged in the very life of nuns; nevertheless, in so far as the constitutions provided, definite works of the apostolate were approved. Finally, these documents vigorously recommended the uniting of autonomous monasteries of nuns into federations so that they could give effective help to one another in this work of renewal. However, convents of nuns often only hesitatingly complied with this recommendation.[30] A broader area which stood in need of reform was that of the formation and instruction of candidates for the priesthood in religious communities. As early as 1924 in an apostolic letter to the superiors of orders Pope Pius XI had indicated the necessity of a solid education of religious clerics, oriented to the heritage of Saint Thomas. The same concern was the object of the instruction of the Congregation of Religious of 1 December 1931, which at the same time, in the period of the great flood of novices, urged a careful selection of candidates.[31] Pope Pius XII also, throughout his pontificate, was concerned for a good formation of religious, especially of the priests, through which they should be equipped for the manifold tasks which were imposed on them in the period of the upheaval that was becoming ever more clearly outlined.[32] Finally, on 31 May 1956 appeared the apostolic constitution Sedes Sapientiae, followed on 7 July by general statutes of the Congregation of Religious in the form of directives for implementation.[33] These documents treated not only the forming of candidates for orders of males and for the priesthood, but attributed great importance to their education in pastoral theology as good shepherds of souls. As something new, they prescribed by common law after the completion of the study of philosophy and theology, oriented to the care of souls but more theoretically presented, and the reception of ordination, one additional year devoted to pastoral introduction and practice. And it was urged on all religious institutes to oblige the young fathers, after several years of work, to a year of probation, a sort of second novitiate. In accord with the papal pronouncements of 1931 and 1956, all clerical religious institutes were occupied with the revision of their Ratio studiorum.

---

[24] Acta et documenta Congressus generalis de statibus perfectionis I–IV (Rome 1952f.). The theme of the congress was: "Statuum perfectionis praesentibus temporibus atque adiunctis accommodata renovatio" (ibid. I, 59).

[25] Acta et documenta Congressus Internationalis Superiorissarum generalium (Rome 1953).

[26] Cf. G. Ruiz, "Congressus generalis alter de accommodata statuum perfectionis renovatione a S. C. de Religiosie indictus," Com Rel 36(1957), 387–84.

[27] Cf. Annuario Pontificio 1975, 1477, 1327–49; R. Soullard, "Les unions de superieurs majeurs," L'année canonique 18(1974), 221–30; DIP II, 1423–31. These mergers could, of course, look back to a long history in some countries. Thus the modern Vereinigung Deutscher Ordensobern (VDO) goes back to the Conference of Superiors which was formed when, on the occasion of the Katholikentag at Krefeld in 1898, the superiors of the seven mission houses then existing in Germany met and decreed regular meetings for the future (K. Siepen, "Die Vereinigung Deutscher Ordensobern nach Akten und Berichten des Generalsekretariats der VDO," Ordenskorrespondenz 5[1964], 104–25).

[28] Annuario Pontificio 1975, 1327; on the CLAR see also DIP II, 1418f.

---

[29] AAS 43(1951), 5–24, 37–44. On 25 March 1956 there was issued a further instruction of the Congregation of Religious, which, on the basis of previous experiences with the new legislation, reorganized the matter of enclosure in monasteries of nuns (AAS 48[1956], 512–26).

[30] On the entire matter cf. A. Larraona, La nuova disciplina canonica sulle monache (Rome 1952). The "little inclosure" was again abolished after the council (motu proprio Ecclesiae Sanctae, II, 32 in AAS 58[1966], 780f.).

[31] AAS 16(1924), 133–48, 24(1932), 74–81.

[32] In 1944 the Pope set up in the Congregation of Religious a special commission to direct and supervise this formation (AAS 36[1944], 213f.).

[33] AAS 48(1956), 354–65; X. Ochoa, Leges Ecclesiae II (Rome 1969), 3516–38.

However, Rome's concern was not only for the education of religious priests. In an effort to equip orders of women for their tasks that were becoming more difficult, the Congregation of Religious on 31 May 1955 erected the papal institute Regina Mundi at Rome, which was associated with the theological faculty of the papal Gregorian University. In it women religious were to be prepared in a three-year theological course both for the tasks of directing the members of their institute and for pastoral charges, especially in the area of schooling and education.[34] Rome thereby took up a burning concern of the Congress of Superioresses General of 1952.

The Second Vatican Council and Its Effects

At this stage of the process of a prudent, even timid "timely renewal" came the announcement of the Second Vatican Council, which, with its program of aggiornamento, aroused in wide circles of the Church, even among religious, great and partly also utopian hopes for a comprehensive reform and a profound renovation. The first schema on religious, which had been worked out by the preparatory commission, hardly went beyond what had been planned in reforms under Pius XII and had been in part introduced or implemented. It was understood as a rectilinear continuation of the Pian reform of the institutes.[35] Hence it did not correspond to the expectations which had been placed in this conciliar document on many sides. After tenacious work in the conciliar commissions and lively debate on the place and mandate of the institutes in the Church, at the close of the council there were on hand two important texts, which were expressly concerned with the religious state. Chapter 6 of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (ARTICLES 43–47) aimed to define the theological place of the orders in the [34] X. Ochoa, op. cit. II, 3394f.; cf. the statutes of the institute, issued on 11 February 1956 in ibid., 3457–60.

---

[35] Cf. F. Wulf, "Einführung zum Ordensdekret," LThK, 2d ed., Zweites Vatikanisches Konzil II (Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1967), 250f.

Church. Advisedly, the chapter on the general vocation to sanctity in the Church preceded it. The Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life presupposes these statements and is concerned more in detail with the principles and with particular points of the reform of religious. It is the only one of the documents issued by the council that adopted the program of aggiornamento in the heading, in connection with which, of course, it could refer to the formula of accommodata renovatio coined under Pius XII.[36] The desired timely renewal is defined in the key statement of this decree; it mentions "constant return to the sources of every Christian life and to the spirit of the origin of the individual institutes, but at the same time their adaptation to the changed conditions of the time" (ART. 2).[37]

The reform program which is presented in the decree on the religious life and in the directives issued for its implementation[38] differs essentially in its presuppositions from all preceding efforts in this direction. The reform of the orders under Pius XII was effected by the Holy See and centrally directed. Little latitude was given to the individual institutes for independent decisions. The directives for implementation of the decree on religious now declares: "The religious communities have themselves above all to implement a suitable renewal of the religious life and indeed mainly by means of general chapters" (no. 1). To a special general chapter to be convoked in from two to three years was given full authority to modify particular prescriptions of the constitutions by way of experiment in so far as neither the essence nor the character of the institute was affected; they were promised that experiments contrary to the current general canon law would gladly be permitted by the Holy See, but of course it was required that they must be implemented wisely. The stage of experimentation could be extended, in accord with these guidelines, to as long as fifteen years (no. 6). In the preparation for this reform chapter all members should be involved in a suitable manner through a comprehensive and open survey (no. 4). Together with this decentralization of the reform there occurred a further revision: each institute should strive to preserve or recover its own image, because in this diversity of religious life lay a genuine advantage for the Church. The institutes should investigate the spirit and the original intentions of the founders and the proper healthy traditions and loyally maintain this special legacy in each institute.[39] Finally, again in contrast to the prescriptions issued after the appearance of the Code of Canon Law, it was ordered that the constitutions must consist not only of canonical directives on the nature, goals, and organs of the institute, but must also contain the scriptural and theological principles of the religious life and statements on its relation to the Church and the heritage proper to the particular institutes. The spiritual and the juridical elements must constitute a unity in the constitutions.[40] Clearly these regulations wanted to eliminate the defects which, five decades earlier, after the appearance of the Code of Canon Law, had shown up because of an excessive centralization, leveling, and legalization.

---

[36] Over and above this a special section is devoted to religious in the Decree on the Pastoral Office of Bishops, which treats of their inclusion in the total pastoral work of the individual dioceses (ARTS. 33–35). In the foreword of the Decree on Education for the Priesthood it is said that the prescriptions of this document affect chiefly diocesan priests but are to be applied with the corresponding adaptations to the religious clergy.

[37] Of the commentaries on the decree on religious the following are outstanding: F. Wulf, LThK, 2d ed., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil II (Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1967), 249–307; J.M.R. Tillard, Y. Congar eds., L'adaptation et la rénovation de la vie religieuse (Paris 1967).

[38] Motu proprio Ecclesiae Sanctae of 6 August 1966, Part II in AAS 58 (1966), 775–82.

Three guiding principles were given to the reform chapters as a standard for their decrees: renewal had to take place in fidelity to the spirit of the founder and the sound traditions of the institute, in obedience to the directions of the council, and in receptiveness to the signs of the time. Now the proposed renewal of religious life is primarily a spiritual event; hence it is difficult to grasp and to measure. However, in general it can be said that the religious institutes worked in the preparation of their reform chapter and in the discussions and decrees of this chapter in the light of the documents of the Second Vatican Council for a deepened view of the religious life and an up-to-date organization, and rethought the position and mission of their institute in the Church and the world of today.[41] Of course, the lack of clear statements of aim, approved by all, often led to tensions even within individual communities,[42] and made difficult the discovery of jointly decided solutions. In a partly irksome learning process most reform chapters adopted a middle way. Hotheaded champions of a radically new organization of the religious life were, on the whole, as disappointed as were the religious who had hoped that everything would continue in the customary old way. In connection with these reform efforts of the chapters there developed a very lively discussion on the meaning and spirituality of the orders in today's world, which offered some help but occasionally went so far that the basic values of the religious life were questioned. The chief subjects of this discussion were first the religious vows and their concrete realization, in connection with which was especially included the knowledge of the humanities. Then questions of life in community found great interest. Here too much attention was given to psychological and sociological viewpoints, for example, the rules of group dynamics. From this resulted an often one-sided preference for small communities to the disadvantage of the large ones. Finally, the relation to the world stood in the focus of the discussion. At stake was the answer of the institutes to secularization, their openness to the world, their responsibility for the world.[43] Discussion was accompanied by experiment. The general chapters for the most part made vigorous use of the possibilities granted to them. Usually the desires for adaptation regarded as necessary did not break up the framework of the institute's traditional life. However, some experiments exceeded the lines laid down[44] or slipped out of the hands of the orders' superiors. Especially the small communities, which sprouted up in some places, in particular in Holland and the United States, were and are a favorable field of experimentation for more or less radical innovations.[45] These "communes" are obviously inspired by the life-style of the Little Brothers and Little Sisters of Jesus. If many of them proved not to be viable and soon again fell apart, this lay not least in the fact that they lacked the spiritual depth of the communities of Father de Foucauld. The discussions and experiments produced useful starts and impulses. On the other hand, there were undoubtedly also uncontrolled growth and signs of decay.[46] To ward off these errors and debasements was the Pope's aim when on 29 June 1971 he sent to religious the apostolic doctrinal letter Evangelica testificatio on the renewal of the religious life in accord with the Second Vatican Council.[47]

---

[39] Decree on religious Perfectae Caritatis, ART. 2b.

[40] Ecclesiae Sanctae, II, 12–14.

[41] Cf. J. Beyer, "Premier bilan des chapitres de renouveau," NRTh 95(1973), 60–86.

[42] Cf. "Pluralismus und Multiformität im Ordensleben heute. Eine Situations studie," Pro mundi vita, Centrum informationis, no. 47(Brussels 1973).

---

[43] Cf. P. Lippert, "Zwischen Umbruch und Selbstbesinnung. Die Orden im gegenwärtigen Wandel von Kirche und Gesellschaft," HK 29(1975), 346–53. A glance into the present state of the discussion is provided by Concilium 10(1974), 461–540.

[44] Thus the dared and failed attempt to subject a whole monastery to psychoanalysis (HK 20[1966], 127–29; 21[1967], 356–58), or the attempt to have a monastery work together with its group of friends on a common basis (ibid. 23[1969], 551–53).

[45] In Holland there were in 1969 no less than 215 such "life groups" (J. Kerkhofs, Das Schicksal der Orden. Ende oder Neubeginn. [Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1971], 15; cf. F. Wulf, "Die Zukunft des Ordenslebens," GuL 43[1970], 227).

[46] Cf. the different evaluation in the interview of Cardinal Daniélou in GuL 45(1972), 458–63, and in the article of the abbot primate of the Benedictine Confederation, Rembert Weakland, "Krise und Erneuerung des Mönchtums heute. Eine Bilanz nach zehn Jahren," GuL 47(1974), 299–313.

[47] AAS 63(1971), 497–526; cf. also the commentary of A. Schneider, Erneuerung des Ordenslebens (Trier 1973).

For the rest, in this phase of the search for new ways the Holy See maintained a rather waiting, even if carefully observing attitude. All the more surprising was the Pope's exerting of a direct influence on the discussions of the General Congregation of the Jesuits. The Thirty-First General Congregation of this society in 1965–66[48] had already issued reform decrees, but the decision on an up-to-date rule of poverty in the society and on the elimination of the canonical distinction between the "professed," who alone had all the qualifications of full membership with the fourth vow of special obedience to the Pope, and the "coadjutors," who were either coadiutores spirituales (priests) or coadiutores temporales (lay brothers), was postponed. The Thirty-Second General Congregation, from December 1974 to March 1975, was again concerned with these problems. A large majority of the 236 delegates expressed themselves in a test vote for the abolition of "rank" and wished to admit all Jesuits to the four vows. Whereas the General Congregation in no sense saw the priestly and apostolic character of the society jeopardized in this decision, the Pope saw in it a serious deviation from the original intention of the founder. Hence in several comments before and after the test vote he rejected such a change.[49]

The most critical and lamentable phenomenon of the recent period is the many departures from religious communities, which, together with the lack of recruits, have led to a strong rise in the ratio of the old to the total population of the houses and forced the institutes to a drastic reduction of their work in Church and society. Unfortunately, because of the absence of reliable evidence,[50] no exact picture can be gained for the entire Church. However, spot-checks can make the trend clear. Thus in Germany the number of religious priests doubled between 1915 and 1932 from 2,015 to 4,024 and up to 1941 increased further to 5,282. This upward development continued in the postwar years and reached its climax in 1971 with 6,825 religious priests. Thereafter an at first still slow drop-off began, which however soon accelerated because of the age structure. With 6,589 in 1974 the number of religious priests was of course still considerably above the figures of the period before the First World War. On the other hand, in regard to religious brothers in Germany the maximum figure of the prewar period—7,990 in 1937—could never again be equaled, in fact, their number is today, with 3,513, less than in 1915, when there were 3,799 brothers. After the Second World War the apogee, following the severe war losses among religious brothers, came in 1955 with 4,789 brothers. The number of novices in the German novitiates of male institutes, which in the 1950s was about 900, fell rapidly after 1961 and in 1973 reached its nadir with 129. In 1974 it again rose slightly to 152.[51] In the female institutes in Germany also the maximum figure of members in the prewar period was exceeded. Their number grew from 64,249 in 1915 by about half to 97,516 in 1941. The first enumeration after the Second World War yielded 88,934 female religious, and from then on until 1957 their number climbed to 93,260. Thereafter the tendency was retrogressive, in the most recent years very rapidly: in only the five years between 1969 and 1974 their number dropped by about 10,000, from 86,340 to 76,924. The number of female novices in the German religious houses in the period before the Nazi seizure of power fluctuated relatively constantly between 5,500 and 7,000. The year 1935 brought a maximum of 7,488 candidates, then the number dropped quickly to 1,865 in 1941. The decade 1950–60 shows a weak downward curve from 3,996 to 3,264 novices, two years later there were only 2,793, in 1966 less than 2,000, and in 1970 not even 1,000. With 405 novices, the year 1974 brought the lowest point thus far.[52] Apart from the reverses during the period of National Socialism and the Second World War, these numbers may be typical of many countries of Western Europe and North America, whereas the religious institutes in some places of the Third World indicate a strong growth at this time.[53]

---

[48] The convocation of this General Congregation in the spring of 1965 was made necessary by the fact that, after the death of the General J.B. Janssens (1889–1964, general since 1946), a successor had to be elected. The election fell on the Basque, Father Arrupe (b. 1907). This General Congregation was interrupted to await the close of the council and came to an end in the fall of 1966 (HK 19[1964–65], 563–67, 21[1967], 33–37).

[49] F. Wulf, "Wohin steuern die Jesuiten? Ein Bericht," GuL 48(1975), 137–47; E. Coreth, "Die Jesuiten, der Papst und die Gesamtkirche," HK 29(1975), 472–77.

[50] Cf. A. Faller, "De statistica Religiosorum," ComRel 35(1956), 72–84.

A similar picture is sketched in the statistics published by individual religious institutes. The Society of Jesus in 1914 counted altogether 16,894 members. This number grew continually to 1965, when the maximum was reached with 36,038 members; in 1974 there were only 29,436. In the published statistics the number of 4,032 scholastics for [51] F. Groner, Kirchliches Handbuch. Amtliches statistisches Jahrbuch der katholischen Kirche Deutschlands 25(1957–61), 524, 536, 26(1962-1968), 533, 27(1969–74), 41.

---

[52] Ibid. 25(1957–61), 538, 26(1962–68), 533, 27(1969–74), 41.

[53] Cf. G. Moorhouse, Bastionen Gottes. Orden und Klöster in dieser Zeit (Hamburg 1969), 90–94. In Informationes, edited by the Congregation for Religious (SCRIS), a statistic is offered which classifies for the end of 1974 the percentage proportion of novices and temporarily professed in the total number of religious and even arranges it by continents (1[1975], 95–98). Of course, in this summary only institutes of papal right are included to the extent that they are subject to the Congregation of Religious. Besides, it must be noted that in mission lands usually the time of probation of the novitiate and of temporary profession lasts longer, often twice as long as in Europe.

1974 means the lowest figure for this century; in 1965 there were still 9,865 of them. Also the number of novices dropped in this decade almost by half, from 1,555 to 804. In the same period 1,530 fathers left the Society of Jesus with a dispensation.[54] In religious institutes of papal right alone, 1,615 religious priests abandoned the priestly ministry in 1972. 1,355 brothers and 3,507 sisters in perpetual profession were dispensed from their vows.[55]

The reasons for this falling-off of religious vocations in the last fifteen years are many-layered. As especially the look at the novitiate shows, the council did not cause the crisis of recruits—it was already present—it could not, however, eliminate it but rather accelerated it. Especially to be mentioned as reasons are the general insecurity, especially of young people, following the upheaval in society and Church, the uncertainty of role, conditioned by this, of many religious, the polarization of opinions becoming evident in religious communities, also a narrow presentation of marriage and sex and their significance for the autonomous development of persons, an at times unrestrained criticism of every form of authority, and the influence of the welfare and consumer society on the thought and attitude of youth in the industrialized countries. But on the other hand another circumstance must not be overlooked. An inquiry among male religious in the German Federal Republic showed that, according to the situation of 1 January 1965, 78 percent of religious priests and even 86.5 percent of religious brothers came from families with four and more children. More than 42 percent of the fathers and almost 58 percent of the brothers were born in rural communities of less than five thousand inhabitants.[56] But the family of many children has become a rarity today, especially in the country, and so this source for religious vocations is to a great extent exhausted. Besides, today in the industralized nations educational opportunities and professions are available to all girls, whereas earlier they were accessible almost exclusively to religious women.

A slight upward development that can be ascertained on the level of the entire Church in the last two years gives the Congregation of Religious occasion for cautious optimism.[57]

The enhanced collaboration of male and female religious superiors on the national and international level since the council became of great importance. The conferences of superiors, urged as early as the Congress of Orders in 1950, were now set up in almost all countries, to the extent that they did not exist before the council.[58] The Roman unions of superiors general and of superioresses general acquired a new importance because in a much greater degree they were invited by the congregations of the Curia for consultations and exchange of experiences. Several times a year sixteen elected representatives of these unions—eight male and eight female superiors general—meet with the cardinal prefect, secretary, undersecretary, and other leading officials of the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes.[59] In the last years the congregation has issued no important document affecting all religious institutes which was not suggested by the unions or about which they had not previously heard.[60] Similarly the contact of the superiors and superioresses general of missionary institutes was established with the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples. The "Council of Eighteen" meets several times a year with the authoritative officials of that congregation. Also outside this organizational framework the efforts of the congregations of the Curia for increased contact with the religious communities are unmistakable. Visits of the cardinal prefect, the secretary, or one of the undersecretaries to general chapters, meetings of national conferences of superiors, and other formal or informal gatherings, not only at Rome but also in other cities and countries of Europe and overseas have belonged for several years to the normal program of these curial offices.[61] The exchange of experience, which is thereby facilitated, has a very positive impact.

---

[54] DIP II, 1280, 1284; cf. also HK 19(1964–65), 563, and Jesuiten. Wohin steuert der Orden?, 2d ed. (Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1976), 13–18.

[55] Annuarium statisticum Ecclesiae 1972, 213, 217, 219; cf. ibid., 70–84.

[56] W. Menges, Die Ordensmänner in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (Cologne 1969), 63, 130; 51, 129.

[57] SCRIS, Informationes 1(1975), 96.

The Orders in the Field of Tension between Church and State

The religious institutes were especially exposed in the field of tension between Church and state. They were for the most part extraordinarily severely affected by the anti-Church measures of a government. The laws of the Kulturkampf had an aftereffect on the orders, partly even far into this century. In Germany the "Jesuit Law" of 1872 was not entirely repealed until 1917. Norway abolished the prohibition of Jesuits, which was incorporated into the constitution, in 1956, and in Switzerland the article on denominational exceptions in the constitution of the federation, which forbade the Society of Jesus and the "societies affiliated" with it and prohibited new foundations of all institutes, did not come to an end until after a majority of only some 55 percent of the citizens had expressed themselves in favor of its abolition in a referendum in 1973.[62]

---

[58] Annuario Pontificio 1975, 1327–49; DIP II, 1423–31.

[59] Cf. "Attività del Consiglio dei 16," SCRIS, Informationes 1(1975), 89–94. This body is called the "Council of Sixteen" because of the sixteen religious who belong to it.

[60] Cf., for example, A. Schneider, Instruktion über die zeitgemässe Erneuerung der Ausbildung zum Ordensleben (Trier 1970), 16–18.

[61] "Les rencontres des Responsables de la SCRIS avec les Religieux chez eux." SCRIS, Informationes 1(1975), 83–89.

Hence it goes without saying that the Church, wherever there was question of negotiations for a concordat with a government, exerted itself to secure by treaty the legal situation of the institutes, their right to erect new houses, and the free exercise of the activities proper to them. In countries with a sufficient number of native religious the Church was usually prepared for the compromise that the higher superiors of the institute must have corresponding citizenship in the nation.[63] Of course, this protection by concordats was to prove to be of little effect in many nations in the succeeding decades.

In Mexico the conflict between Church and state, going far back into the nineteenth century, reached a climax in the first decades of this century. In 1917 the country obtained a new constitution, which, among other things, forbade celibacy, religious vows, and the religious state. Religious were expelled from their houses, their schools and other institutions were closed. After two years these regulations were somewhat modified, but in 1926 they were again put into effect in full severity. Their transgression was strictly punished. Among the best known victims of this persecution, which did not ebb until the end of the 1930s, was Father Augustinus Pro, S.J. (1891–1927), who with great skill and presence of mind worked as a pastor in Mexico City underground and after his imprisonment was falsely charged with sharing in an assassination attempt on former President Obregón and for this reason was shot without any legal proceedings. His process of beatification was introduced in 1952.[64]

A republic was proclaimed in Spain in 1931 and a constitution put into force which had as its aim a radical separation of Church and state and hit hard at the religious institutes, since it not only subjected them to state supervision but also supplied the legal basis for the expropriation of all property of religious. The Society of Jesus was dissolved and its property was confiscated by the state. If the riots of 1931 against the

---

[62] H. Liermann, Kirchen und Staat I (Munich 1954), 14f.; HK 11(1956–57), 167, 27(1973), 322–24.

[63] Concordat with Bavaria (1924), ARTS. 2 and 13, par. 2; Poland (1925), ART. X; Rumania (1927), ART. XVII; Lithuania (1927), ART. X; Italy (1929), ART. 29b; Baden (1932), ART. V with concluding protocol; Austria (1933), ART. X; German Reich (1933), ART. 15; Portugal (1940), ARTS. III and IX; Spain (1953), ART. IV; and the Dominican Republic (1954), ARTS. IV and X.

[64] LThK VII, 2d ed. (1962), 151–55; LThK VIII, 2d ed. (1963), 776; J. Echeverria, Der Kampf gegen die katholische Kirche in Mexiko (München-Gladbach 1926).

Church were still locally restricted, the storm broke out furiously against the monasteries during the three-year civil war, which followed General Franco's coup d'état of 1936. The cruel balance of the age of terror: in addition to 4,184 diocesan priests and seminarians, 2,365 male and 283 female religious were murdered, as well as many lay persons.[65]

In Germany at first National Socialism found sympathizers among a certain segment of the Catholics as well as among some of the religious. An especially unfortunate role was played by an outsider, Abbot Alban Schachleiter (1861–1937), who had been expelled from his abbey, Sankt Emaus at Prague, in 1918 and had lived in Bavaria since 1921; he expected from Hitler the realization of his own German national ideas, and so from 1922 he recruited for him and his movement in talks and appeals and let himself be misused as a pretense. Energetic rebukes and even penal measures of the archepiscopal ordinariate of Munich and of the superiors of the order could not make the aging abbot change his tune.[66] After the seizure of power the Nazi government in ARTICLE 15 of the concordat guaranteed the freedom of religious communities and the unimpeded exercise of their activities both in the pastoral and in the educational and social and charitable sphere; the private schools of the orders were even dealt with in a special article (ART. 25). But the orders were soon able to experience the true aims of the new holders of power.[67] This began with annoying searches of the houses and interrogations. In 1935–36 a series of show-trials was conducted, chiefly against religious because of transgressions against rules on foreign exchange; heavy sentences of imprisonment were decreed against the accused.[68] While the trials on foreign exchange were still in progress, preparations were being made for a second series of trials against religious and priests. From the end of 1935, but especially in 1936 and 1937, the Gestapo searched in monasteries and in boarding schools and nursing homes conducted by monasteries for evidence of moral failings in order to be able to denounce the monasteries as hotbeds of immorality. The intensity of the searches, the methods employed in the inquiries, the fixing of the dates of the proceedings, ordered by the executive, as well as the carefully prepared and centrally directed evaluation for propaganda purposes make clear that the authorities were not mainly concerned for the punishment and elimination of evil situations. Instead, here the orders were to be affected in their entirety. Not by accident did the chief trials reach their climax in the months following publication of the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge of 14 March 1937.[69] But above all these trials were steps toward a still more comprehensive goal that was thus formulated in a secret instruction of the Ministry for Security of 15 February 1938: "The orders are the militant arm of the Catholic Church. Hence they must be forced out of their spheres of influence, curtailed, and finally annihilated."[70] To this end the government, following the successful military campaigns in the West at the high point of its power, made ready for a new blow. On the most varied pretexts, but often without any justification, many religious houses were confiscated between the fall of 1940 and the spring of 1941 and the religious expelled from the monasteries or even from the very districts of their former residences, as long as they were not required for the continuance of farm work or made liable to service.[71] These measures were stopped at the beginning of the Russian campaign, and the total annihilation of the orders was put off until the postwar period in order not to evoke further unrest among the Catholic population. Of course, these measures extended also to the countries and territories incorporated into the Reich and to the occupied areas. There they were carried out more severely and ruthlessly because no concordatal restrictions existed. Thus a thirteen-points program of 1940 for occupied Poland, the "Warthegau," provided under number 12: "All communities and monasteries are abolished, since these are not in accord with the German policy of morality and population."[72] Many religious were thrown into prisons and concentration camps, several were executed. Among these last was the [65] A. Montero Moreno, Historia de la persecución religiosa en España 1936–1939 (Madrid 1961), 762, 765–67.

---

[66] G. Engelhard, Abt Schachleiter, der deutsche Kämpfer (Munich 1941); H. Witetschek, Die kirchliche Lage in Bayern nach den Regierungspräsidentenberichten 1933–1943 I: Regierungsbezirk Oberbayern (Mainz 1966), 1, n. 1; now cf. also L. Volk, Akten Kardinal Michael von Faulhabers 1917–1945 I: 1917–1934(Mainz 1975), passim.

[67] On what follows cf. J. Neuhäusler, Kreuz und Hakenkreuz (Munich 1946), I, 122–64; II, 250–92.

[68] After the war several of those then condemned—many had meanwhile died—applied for the juridical annulment of these verdicts and obtained their rehabilitation. The courts came to understand that these "verdicts issued in 1935–36 had come primarily from political reasons and followed the aim of bringing the Catholic orders and, with them, the Catholic Church into discredit with the German people" (E. Hoffmann, H. Janssen, Die Wahrheit über die Ordensdevisenprozesse 1935/36 [Bielefeld 1967], 265).Cf. the justification of the verdict of the State Court of Berlin-Moabit of 27 February 1951 (ibid., 270). A Bonn dissertation on the foreign exchange trials is being prepared by Petra Rapp.

---

[69] J. Neuhäusler, op.cit. I, 133–44; H.G. Hockerts, Die Sittlichkeitsprozesse gegen katholische Ordensangehörige und Priester 1936/37 (Mainz 1971).

[70] Quoted in J. Neuhäusler, op.cit. I, 123.

[71] Ibid., 148–64.

[72] Quoted in B. Stasiewski, "Die Kirchenpolitik der Nationalsozialisten im Warthegau 1939–1945," Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte 7 (1959), 55.

Polish Franciscan, Father Maximilian Kolbe (1894–1941), who, taking the place of another prisoner, died in the starvation barracks of the Auschwitz concentration camp and was beatified in 1971, the Jewish philosopher and Carmelite nun Edith Stein (1891–1942), who was dragged from the Carmel at Echt in Holland, to which she had fled, in order to share the fate of the other Jews, and the Jesuit Alfred Delp (1907–1945), who was executed in Berlin-Plötzensee for alleged high treason against the nation.[73]

The persecution of the Church which broke out in Russia after the Bolshevik October Revolution affected chiefly the Orthodox monasteries; however, the few Catholic religious houses were not spared.[74] Only after the victory over Poland and when, after the Second World War, the Baltic countries and eastern Poland were definitively annexed to the Soviet Union did Catholic religious houses in large numbers fall into the Communist power sphere. In Latvia and the formerly Polish part of the Ukraine religious men and women were expelled from their houses and forced to return to civilian life; their houses fell to the state.[75] In Lithuania, where about 80 percent of the population professed the Roman Catholic faith, such severe measures were at first not feasible. At first the government was content with a strict supervision and spying on the monasteries, but after 1944 all religious houses here were suppressed.[76]

In the countries in which the Communists seized power after the Second World War, regard for the denominational situation likewise obviously played an important role in the proceedings. The harshest measures occurred everywhere in the years before 1956. In Albania the orders were entirely extirpated. The foreign religious were expelled, the Albanians were forced to put aside their habit and become part of the economic process.[77] Something similar was true of Bulgaria.[78] In Czechoslovakia all religious houses were occupied by the militia in April 1950 after a highly publicized show-trial of ten religious had taken place in Prague on the allegation of high treason.[79] Religious of various communities were crowded into "concentration monasteries," the male and female religious still capable of work were requisitioned for places in farming and in factories. Some sisters were allowed to continue caring for the aged, the sick, and the invalids because of the lack of other personnel. "At the end of 1951 there was in all Czechoslovakia not a single religious house apart from the concentration convents,' which were in reality compulsory labor camps."[80] The mitigations and relaxations of the Dubček era[81] were again annulled, step by step.[82] Of the 160 religious houses which there were in Rumania in 1945, only twenty-five still existed in 1953.[83] The Hungarian minister for popular education, József Révai, explained in a speech delivered at the beginning of June 1950: "In the people's democracy religious are no longer needed because they no longer correspond to their vocation, indeed they sabotage the tasks of democracy. Hence it is necessary that as soon as possible it be made impossible for them further to harm the interests of democracy."[84] Shortly thereafter began a wave of deportations of religious. The Hungarian episcopate tried to avert the worst and on 30 August 1950 signed a treaty, which, among other things, provided that eight Catholic schools—six for boys, two for girls—might again be opened and the religious needed for the administration of their schools continue in this function. A numerus clausus was imposed on these communities in regard to the acceptance of new members.[85] All other religious communities were suppressed in September 1950 against the protest of the episcopate, and the approximately ten thousand male and female religious were ordered to leave their houses within three months, to discard the habit, and to take up a secular occupation.[86] In 1968 the eight approved monasteries counted, according to the figures of government offices, 232 fathers, twenty-seven novices and students, and fifty-nine sisters.[87]

---

[73] B.M. Kempner, Priester vor Hitlers Tribunalen (Munich 1966), documented the verdicts against many other religious.

[74] Cf. J.S. Curtiss, Die Kirche in der Sowjetunion (Munich 1957), 80–83.

[75] A. Galter, Rotbuch der verfolgten Kirche (Recklinghausen 1957), 66, 91.

[76] Ibid., 81; HK 19(1964–65), 261.

[77] A. Galter, op.cit., 239f.; HK 22(1968), 195.

[78] A. Galter, op.cit., 252f.

[79] HK 4(1949–50), 411.

In Yugoslavia the situation of the orders in the first ten years of Communist rule was no less miserable. In Bosnia-Herzegovina and Slovenia all religious houses were suppressed and many religious were arrested and killed. One hundred thirty-nine Franciscans alone fell victim to the persecution. In the mid-1950s there occurred a relaxation of tension, which had as a consequence an amazing revival of the orders, especially in the republics of Slovenia and Croatia, where the number of members of the orders rose considerably since 1958.[88]

---

[80] A. Galter, op.cit, 202–6, quotation 205; HK 15(1960f.), 561.

[81] HK 22(1968), 211, 412.

[82] HK 24(1970), 304f., 571f., 25(1971), 186, 27(1973), 609.

[83] A. Galter, op.cit., 301.

[84] Quoted in A. Galter, op.cit., 346, n. 79.

[85] There was question of two schools each of the Benedictines, Franciscans, Piarists, and the School Sisters of Szeged (A. Galter, op.cit., 352, n. 90).

[86] A. Galter, op.cit., 345–53; HK 5(1950f.), 33f.

[87] Pro mundi vita, centrum informationis, Heft 19(1967), 10–12.

A similar picture results for Poland. Here at first there were years of misery and distress. Religious were removed from schools, hospitals, and other institutions. Up to 1953 54 religious had been killed, 200 deported, 170 thrown into prison.[89] On 14 April 1950 an agreement was reached between the government and the Polish episcopate, which in ARTICLE 19 contains the guarantee: "Orders and congregations of religious will have full freedom of action in the framework of their calling and the laws in force."[90] Nevertheless, at first there occurred further imprisonments. Not until the mid-1950s did the situation calm down, and the number of religious has since then grown significantly, both in the male and the female institutes.[91] Poland may be the only Socialist country which today can dispose of a considerable number of religious for use in mission lands.

In China and North Korea there are no more religious houses. The foreign missionaries were expelled, the not inconsiderable number of native religious were sent home in so far as they did not perish. The fate of the orders in Indochina, especially in Vietnam, is unknown at the moment.

The glance at the last six decades of church history shows how very much the orders live in and with the Church. Periods in which ecclesiastical life flourished were for the orders times of interior and exterior growth and vitality; in ages of crisis, on the contrary, they proved to be especially vulnerable. This dependence on the total ecclesiastical climate, however, must not cause the orders to forget that in all generations healing influences and impulses are expected from them. Precisely in this consist the heritage and task which religious communities in their totality have received from the great founders, who in the Church's periods of need created cells of inner renewal in order through them to permeate the Church with fresh energy.

---

[88] A. Galter, op.cit., 403f.; LThK V, 2d ed. (1960), 1193; Pro mundi vita, Centrum informationis, no. 19(1967), 10, 13.

[89] A. Galter, op.cit., 157.

[90] HK 4(1949f.), 413.

[91] Pro mundi vita, Centrum informationis, No. 19(1967), 10–12; HK 26 (1972), 205.

CHAPTER 12

*Educational System, Education, and Instruction

Church and Society in Their Relation to the Educational System

The influence which the Church can exert on the educational system of our time is dependent on its position in the social and political system of the moment,[1] the legal, moral, and material conditions prevailing in it, the relations of the Church's educational mission to the expectations of the population or, respectively, the aims of the government—and all this is often dependent on the history in which and out of which the Church's educational efforts have acquired their national character.[2] The influence thus depends also on the Church itself: from its understanding of its function and from the ideas and energies which it proclaims in favor of its educational mission and which can apply to the apostolic mission in the stricter sense and to the service of the world in the broader sense.

In Europe the educational system, earlier established by the Church and for a long time determined by it, lost much ground after the introduction of the general obligation of going to school, the taking over of schools and universities by the state, the emphasizing of science and of the secular in instruction, and the rapid increase of voluntary school attendance—explosion scholaire. Educational systems with overwhelmingly Catholic—for example, in Belgium—or at least nonstate educational institutions—for example, the Netherlands—are the exception. In the United States the Catholic educational system has powerfully gained in substance in the course of this century and has reached a point where further increases scarcely seem any longer possible, and the distinction in regard to the education and formation imparted in non-Catholic institutions is beginning to decrease. In the Latin American nations there is, it is true, a stability in Catholic educational institutions, but the great task of mass education which cannot be accomplished by them reduces their earlier importance. In the missions of the nations of the Third World the situation is determined by the form of decolonization, "nation building," and socioeconomic development; socialist regimes which are modeled on the protecting powers of the Communist camp, whether dominated by Moscow or Peking, are hostile to the Church's educational mission; the same is true where a non-Christian religion, such as Islam, is the state religion. More favorable are the circumstances in countries supported by Western powers. In the Communist states of Europe and Asia the Church was radically excluded from the educational system.

---

* Paul-Ludwig Weinacht

[1] Cf. UNESCO, ed., World Survey of Education V (Paris 1971), 27f.

[2] On the extensive and intensive interpretation, extending back to par. 13, II, 12 of the common law, of the idea of school supervision in Germany, cf. T. Oppermann, Kulturverwaltungsrecht (Tübingen 1969), 252f. For the historical situation of schools under free auspices, especially of the Catholic schools in Europe, cf. W. Schultze, ed., Schulen in Europa, 3 vols. (Weinheim and Berlin 1968), the relevant chapters. On the colonial stamp of the African educational system, cf. T. Hanf, "Erziehung und politischer Wandel in Schwarzafrika," D. Oberndörfer, ed., Systemtheorie, Systemanalyse und Entwicklungsländerforschung (=Ordo Politicus 14) (Berlin 1971), 536.

On the whole few generalizations can be made on the present state of the educational system established or determined by the Church or oriented to it. The generalization according to which the impact of the religious factor[3] in instruction and education slackens and the Church is either excluded from the educational system or withdraws from it is surely too sweeping. For it mistakes the new type of exchange relations between Church and society as they were expressed and urged in the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes and introduced a turning in Catholic school policy.

While before the Second Vatican Council the Catholic Church understood education as an integrating element of an educational process of the faithful to be religiously founded and forming part of the Church's responsibility, and accordingly placed the greatest value on the institutionalization of the "Catholic school," the Protestant Church, at least in Germany, had given up such ideas since the 1950s. In its 1958 declaration of the school question the Protestant Church in Germany made known that it understood itself not first of all as an educational power struggling for influence but as the custodian of liberty. In this was expressed the Lutheran conviction, preserved in Protestantism, of the necessity of a "strictly secular government." Here school no longer meant—a few years before the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes—an innate function of the Church but an objective task which could be provided for in a wordly and sensible way, even in collaboration with non-Christians.[4]

The educational system is not only the means and addressee of ecclesiastical influence; it also has an impact of its own on the Church. Such repercussions occur over the conditions of formation of the ecclesiastical recruits—state reforms of education, in Germany: the altered status of humanistic programs, and so forth—over changes in the curriculum[5] and of the conditions of scholarship in which theology is expressed, over the type of teaching in religious instruction—the didactics of religious instruction—and not least over the expansion of the hitherto charitably restricted services in the field of school and nursing through the professionalization of the teaching personnel. These changes got under way on a broad front without its being already discernible which formula—rationalization of the mysterium, adaptation to the world, loss of the philosophia perennis, dissolution of unity or viable diversity, dialogue, new catholicity, and so forth—is suited conclusively to describe the direction of the process.

---

[3] Cf. also F. Schneider, Vergleichende Erziehungswissenschaft (Heidelberg 1961), 154ff.

[4] On the so-called Protestant School Doctrine cf. A. von Campenhausen, Erziehungsauftrag und staatliche Schulträgerschaft. Die rechtliche Verantwortung für die Schule (Göttingen 1967), 129ff. On the problem of community relations between the Protestant and the Catholic school doctrine, cf. E.M. Heufelder, O.S.B., "Gibt es ein gemeinsames Leitbild für katholische und evangelische Erziehung?" Una Sancta (private printing, 1966), 229ff.

Catholic Educational and School Doctrine

The doctrinal expressions of the Popes on the educational system must be understood as concretizations, relevant to the occasion and the time, of the apostolic task of the Church to proclaim and attest the message of Jesus Christ, to assure the conditions for the realization of this apostolate against encroachments and decay and constantly to improve it and in this regard to express ever more strongly the personal importance of education and solidarity with those who, like UNESCO since 1946, have also set as their goal the education and training of all peoples.[6]

In the first half of the twentieth century the Church was interested in retaining Christian education intact as an integral element of formation in and spreading of the faith. The Holy See exerted itself in the reorganization of the educational system in Europe after the First World War to assure the Church's interests by diplomatic means—the concordat policy—by the encouraging of ecclesiastical educational institutions, for example, the recognition of universities as "papal universities," by establishing a Christian educational system independent of the state, and by support of the missions, especially under Pius XI, to promote the spread of the faith through educational institutions.

---

[5] The central themes, which are discussed under the term "curriculum," are educational aims, teaching content, and organization of learning (cf. also K. Frey in L. Roth, ed., Handlexikon zur Erziehungswissenschaft [Munich 1976], with citation of further literature [p. 85]). For the discussion of the reform of theological study cf. "Kommission 'Curricula in Theologie' des Westdeutschen Fakultätentages," by E. Feifel, ed., Studium Katholischer Theologie, Berichte, Analysen, Vorschläge 1–5 (Zurich 1973–75).

[6] H. Fries, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe I (Munich 1962), 319ff.

At the same time, that is, from the end of the First World War, the Popes, beginning with Benedict XV's letter of 19 April 1919, Communes litteras, formulated a relatively complete "Catholic educational and school doctrine," which on the basis of biblical and theological statements, of traditional ecclesiastical ideas on education, paedagogia perennis, as well as of pertinent articles from the Code of Canon Law (Canons 1372–83), contained doctrinal propositions on education and school under compulsory aspects and determined the epoch down to the Second Vatican Council. In addition to the already mentioned letter Communes litteras, its standard document is Pius XI's encyclical Divini illius Magistri of 31 December 1929;[7] also to be mentioned are the messages of Pius XII—address to the Youth of the A.C.I., to the Fathers of Families of France of September 1951—the message of John XXIII of 30 December 1959 on the thirtieth anniversary of the appearance of Pius XI's encyclical on education as well as passages of the encyclical Mater et Magistra of 15 May 1961.

All the expressions were based on the twofold right of the Church, which, first, by virtue of its teaching function, has to educate its members for full citizenship in the Kingdom of God, and, second, by virtue of its supernatural motherhood, brings forth, nourishes, and trains souls for the divine life of grace, according to the encyclical Divini illius Magistri, nos. 16 and 17.[8] Against the background of a really centennial loss of the Church's power to regulate education and in view of the threat to Christian cultural values from liberalism and Modernism in Europe and North America, the Popes raised the demand for the material catholicity of the educational world of its members, that is, either educational institutions must stand under Catholic auspices and responsibility or state and other educational institutions must be permeated by the Catholic spirit. These demands were pinpointed from two sides: Catholic Christians were obliged in conscience to send their children to Catholic schools; non-Church, mixed, or neutral schools were forbidden to them in Canon 1374 and the encyclical Divini illius Magistri, no. 79; the Church itself claimed an all-embracing right of supervision of the schools, guaranteed only fragmentarily by concordat.

---

[7] Die christliche Erziehung der Jugend, Enzyklika "Divini illius magistri" von Pius XI., Lateinisch-deutsche Ausgabe, eingeleitet und mit textkritischen Anmerkungen versehen von R. Pfeil (Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1959).

[8] Pius XI's encyclical on education appeared three decades after the beginning of radical school reform. It quite critically opposes pedagogical naturalism, which, while seeking to draw "out of the child," had slight regard for the claim of objective organizations and confused education with development (cf. also F. Pöggeler in Dokumente des II. Vatikanischen Konzils V: Declaratio de educatione christiana/Über christliche Erziehung [Trier 1966], 10).

Within the papal teaching the role of the state was defined to the effect that it has a right to educate and must exercise it, not immoderately by a school monopoly but according to the principle of subsidiarity, with regard for the parents' right. Its tasks lay especially in the spheres of training state officials and education in citizenship. In the papal teaching the parents always ranked as the innate and professional educators of their children. However, their right of education was not "autonomous" but one participating in the mandate of salvation and the Church's magisterium and pastoral office. The vigorous defense of this denominational right of parents by the Church was marked characteristically by the obligation of the parents to exercise their right in accord with their duties as Catholic parents—baptism, Catholic training of the children. In the concrete this could mean that they had to vote for Catholic denominational schools, if possibilities of voting were available and corresponding ecclesiastical directives were at hand.

The Catholic educational and school doctrine assumed as a condition of its effectiveness that traditional ecclesiastical authority, the structure of social institutions, and a certain "Catholic milieu" were intact. On such a basis it was possible that a few simple so-called "Catholic educational principles" were respected: the right of parents, family and school instruction in accord with the denomination, rejection of coeducation, and care for an instruction proper to each sex. They could easily be integrated into the system of Church doctrine and canon law and possessed the character of commandments. The great success, at least in Germany, of the Church's school policy was attributed by a person in the Protestant camp even to the "binding of the consciences of Catholics" by Church directives.[9]

The Second Vatican Council and the Postconciliar Period

After the Second World War there appeared throughout the world new situations in the sphere of education which could not but convulse the Catholic educational and school doctrine. Education was assigned social functions and became, especially in the countries of the Third World, but also in the industrialized nations, a strategic point of social development. Even in the field of personality education a social desire for adaptation and ascent claimed recognition, which demolished overnight waves of respect once encompassing Catholic schools. The road of separate and particular cultures to a modern, Western, secular, and dynamic educational society, concerned with economic growth and the growth of information, seemed to indicate the direction of general progress.

---

[9] A. von Campenhausen, op. cit. (above, n. 4), 119f.

From the viewpoint of the Catholic educational system there were various problems: the problem of the quality and of the comparable standards relative to the developed non-Catholic educational institutions; the problem of quantity in view of newly appearing needs in accord with the degrees of education—basic education, eradication of illiteracy; the problem of subsistence in view of rising building and maintenance costs; the problem of spirituality in view of the reduced number of clerical teachers or political exactions on the part of the governments of the moment—thus in Pakistan and Egypt religious instruction in Islam must be given; finally, the problem of self-understanding: as agent of the spreading of the faith or as a regular school for children of Catholic families or as an offer by Catholics to all, that is, as an instrument of Christian service to the world.

In its "Declaration on Christian Education" the council confirmed the basic features of the traditional Catholic school doctrine in the question of the function of education, of those qualified to educate—"first and preferably" the parents, subsidiarily the state, in a specific way the Church—of the natural law character of the parents' right and its confirmation in the question of the "choice of school" for the child; it also affirmed the assumption of the rights of education by means of the "child's right," which is not applied without distinction but must be seen by means of the child's natural abilities and his supernatural goal lying in the coresponsibility of the Church.

Traditionally the means suited to this goal and hence obligatory were seen in institutions of material catholicity. In this point the council proved to be more realistic and open: Since it happens that an ever larger area of education is fact-oriented, which neither positively nor negatively touches upon the meaning of Christian existence, it all amounts to the formatio christiana keeping in step with the formatio profana. And since it likewise happens that Catholic Christians are ever more frequently educated in mixed or neutral schools, where the Christian development of the school is institutionally not possible, the religious instruction remains possible, and—in the event that it does not take place in the school—at least the moral and character formation is guaranteed by the Christian spirit. Here the council puts great hope on the personal model of Christian teachers and fellow students, and it refers to the necessity of spiritual help even when this cannot result from within the school district.

With these adaptations to current conditions of Christian existence in the world, a giving up of institution and program bound to the schola catholica is not necessary, even if precisely here in the postconciliar period differences of opinion emerge. In the declaration itself the "Catholic school" is claimed for the educational mandate of the Church against all monopolizing tendencies of the state. Catholic school—this is principally the nonstate school under ecclesiastical or free auspices of a Catholic spirit. In the mission lands it is the first source of divine life and bearer of human culture with a strong apostolic content. As a program it means the exhibition of the "presence of the Church in the modern world," as demanded in the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes; its function is the apostolate, that is, education and formation must serve the spread of God's Kingdom and, along with that, the welfare of the earthly community and its eternal salvation. The character of the educational apostolate defines also the function and position of the teacher in Catholic schools: it depends on him to what extent the aims and initiatives of Catholic schools are realized. Hence he needs a fundamental and constantly renewed formation in the profane and the religious areas and in teaching methods. He should be in a dialogue with his pupils,—inspired by the Christian spirit and extending beyond the school-day, and work intimately with the parents. In this place, hence in part of the program referring to the teacher in the Declaration on Christian Education, occurs the traditional reminder that Catholic parents have the duty "of entrusting their children, when and where this is possible, to Catholic schools, to support these in accord with their means, and to cooperate with them for the good of their children" (ARTICLE 9).

The program of the schola catholica extends over the total grade structure of the educational system, beginning with schools of the elementary and secondary grades, which "lay the foundation of education," for the professional schools, the institutes for adult education and for social professions, special schools, and institutions for the education of teachers and catechists.

On the universities the declaration expresses itself in a triple aim; it expects from them the training of the national leaders, scholarly contributions to the discovery of truth and to the problems of the modern world—undernourishment, sickness, unjust distribution, and so forth—and finally it expects the institutionalizing of religious and scientific faculties or at least institutes and, from these, contributions to the dialogue between faith and reason, which, if they conscientiously observe one another's conformity with law and competence, can come together in the one truth. These expectations set the framework for "Catholic universities": they deserve encouragement, but so that they stand out, not by their number, but by their scholarly achievement (ART. 10). The statements of the council on the university system remain throughout in the framework of the papal pronouncements of Pius XII, John XXIII, and Paul VI.

The postconciliar period is determined by a partly violent difference of opinion on the existence and range of a Catholic theory of education. Between conservative and progressive theoreticians various passages from conciliar documents were offered as proof of the ecclesiastical nature of their respective ideas. According to the selected theological or ideological relationship in each case there stood out in the Catholic school doctrine long familiar[10] or entirely new features. The newer ones appealed to the Pastoral Constitution as "Magna Carta of the Christian World Understanding and World Mission" and sought to "rethink" the Catholic educational and school doctrine in its light. What is Catholic is understood, not as the culture-determining, religious content, but as form of solidarity, world responsibility, and condition of cooperation with all persons of good will: What must be done concretely is not different for the Catholic from what everyone can aspire to and understand. The Christian faith provides, as regards content, no new insights for the organization of the world and of humans living together; in fact, Catholics would not even have the right to a culture of their own. Since the Church makes its own general human demands and stands up for them, "Catholic schools" must not be understood as special institutions of Catholics for Catholics, but as integrating elements in the "front of all of goodwill" under the idea "of creating in common with them a world in humanity, justice, and freedom."[11]

Similar results are reached by whoever takes as a guiding principle the new nonmetaphysical anthropology of the pastoral constitution, according to which the human being is "defined by his responsibility toward his fellows and toward history." Responsibility toward history is then understood as the obligation to participate in scholarly progress in all varieties and as the abandonment of that older Augustinian outlook, whereby education has meaning for the Christian only where it ceases to be empty curiosity (curiositas) and assumes a relation to eternal salvation. The council simply makes progress and knowledge a duty because in the anthropological view, which corresponds to the situation of today's world, work in it must be understood as a form of fraternity, of humanity, of responsibility, hence in the last analysis as an overflow of the Christian commandment of love. In such a context it is the conscientious duty of Christian parents, in choosing the school for their children, to give the preference to the "Catholic school," seen and justified as the criterion of social liberty. The pluralism of society, hence not a metaphysical but a political principle, justifies the institution "Catholic school." But then may it, as such, be made a conscientious duty for Catholics? Three restrictive considerations are named: (1) the Declaration on Religious Freedom intends that only one who believes of his own accord can be bound in conscience; (2) the pastoral constitution binds the secular discipline to its respective subject matter, hence also the Catholic school to the modern demands on "school"; (3) the Declaration on Christian Education demands that a Catholic school must be Catholic not only formally but materially.

---

[10] Cf., for example, the memorandum composed by Dr. F. Heckenbach, Heilstheologische Begründung der katholischen Schule (Études et Documents no. 4, OIEC) (Brussels 1967). The essential proposition of the memorandum, formulated in evident opposition to the idea of autonomous fields of reality, reads: "Every pedagogical autonomy is destroyed by revelation and the incarnation and is only meaningful as salvation pedagogy" (p. 4).

[11] W. Seibel, "Bildung und Kultur in den Konzilsdokumenten," Christliche Erziehung nach dem Konzil (=Berichte und Dokumente, edited by Kulturbeirat beim Zentralkomitee der deutschen Katholiken) (Cologne 1967), 29f.

Only if all three factors are present can there exist an obligation in conscience for the parents to exercise their right to the free choice of a school in favor of the Catholic school.[12]

In the postconciliar period further decisions were added to the Catholic educational and school doctrine by the Holy See as well as by regional episcopal conferences and other bodies, such as synods. They begin with the commentary of Bishop Doctor Pohlschneider on the German translation of the Declaration on Christian Education, which especially emphasizes the principle of the "apostolate" and attaches it to many conciliar texts.[13] The notion of the Church's mission of salvation in the educational system—not only its solidarity with "all people of good will"—is the "dominant guiding idea of the declaration."

If one surveys the messages of the Holy See published since then, the impression can arise that the reference to the Declaration served rather the inner Church dialogue, since in it the interests of institutions under Catholic or ecclesiastical auspices are especially well expressed and justified;[14] on the other hand, the pastoral constitution or the encyclical Populorum progressio are readily quoted when solidarity with extraecclesiastical organizations should be expressed, whether on the occasion of the anniversary of the eradication of illiteracy campaign of UNESCO[15] or of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of UNESCO.[16]

---

[12] Cf. J. Ratzinger, "Das Menschenbild des Konzils in seiner Bedeutung für die Bildung," Christliche Erziehung (preceding note), 62f.

[13] For example, the dogmatic constitution Lumen gentium, no. 17, the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity Ad gentes, nos. 35–41, the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, nos. 28–32.

[14] Cf. the message on the centenary celebration of the founding of the Catholic universities in France in AAS 67 (1975), 695, and finally the document of the Congregation for Catholic Education by Means of the Catholic School of 5 July 1977.

The Latin American Church placed its resolutions on education entirely under the idea, urged by Gaudium et spes, of the coresponsibility for the process of transformation of the Latin American peoples and their liberation. Clear postponing of accent vis-à-vis Western European and North American philosophy and theology were discernible.[17] Starting with the Catholic University of Santiago de Chile, capitalism and liberalism were blamed for the postcolonial servitude of Latin America and it was believed that in this spirit the real identity could never be found. The promise for the problems of Latin America lies not in the industrialized countries of the First World, but in Latin America itself. The task for education consists in enabling the Latin American illiterates "to develop a cultural world themselves, as creators of their own progress, in a creative and original way."[18]

The line which the Holy See pursues in the assuring and promoting of ecclesiastical interests in the educational system of the European states is not different from the preconciliar line: by means of treaties between the respective nations and the Holy See prescriptions of concordats in force are extrapolated or supplemented.[19] More powerfully than in the preconciliar phase, the pronouncements of the council and of the Popes are placed in close contact with declarations of other sovereign political bodies, and the unity of all peoples of good will in the one goal is stressed, thus formulated by Paul VI on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of UNESCO: "construire un monde fraternel," "promouvoir une civilisation de l'universel."[20] The Declaration on Christian Education in ART. 12 had already pointed in this direction, that people must strive with all their means that "an appropriate coordination may come into being among Catholic schools, and between them and the other schools that cooperation may be fostered which the welfare of all human society demands." Coordination and cooperation were realized in the inner Catholic sphere by a liaison office for the national school bureaus and societies in Brussels, the Office International de l'Enseignement Catholique (OIEC); active in relation to UNESCO in Paris is the Centre Catholique International de Coordination auprès de l'UNESCO (CCIC)[21] The first permanent observer of the Holy See at the General Secretariat of UNESCO was, by the way, Monsignore Roncalli, the future Pope John XXIII.[22]

---

[15] AAS 61 (1969), 665.

[16] AAS 63(1971), 837f. Furthermore, the Declaration on Christian Education, ART. 1, is relevant to the droit à l'éducation.

[17] Cf. J. Ratzinger, "Der Weltdienst der Kirche. Auswirkungen von 'Gaudium et Spes' im letzten Jahrzehnt," Internationale Katholische Zeitschrift, 4th year (1975), no. 5, 439ff. (444f.).

[18] Die Kirche in der gegenwärtigen Umwandlung Lateinamerikas im Lichte des Konzils. Beschlüsse der II. Generalversammlung des Lateinamerikanischen Episkopates, Medellin v. 24. 8. bis 6.9.1968 (Essen [ADVENIAT] 1970), 49f.

[19] Appendix to the treaty with Austria of 9 July 1962 on 25 April 1972 in regard to subsidies for salaries in Catholic schools of public law, in AAS 64 (1972), 478ff.; also the modification of the concordat with Lower Saxony of 26 February 1965 on 21 May 1973, in AAS 65(1973), 643ff.; also the treaties with Rhineland-Palatinate on 15 May 1973, in AAS 65(1973), 631ff., and with the Saarland on 21 February 1975, in AAS 67(1975), 248ff.

[20] Cf. n. 16.

Catholic Education in the European and North American Educational Systems

Catholic exertions in regard to education were realized within the pertinent historical and regional circumstances which on the one hand determined the character of the Church and on the other hand the character of its relations to the social and political milieu. The following types are of use for a comparative presentation of the Catholic educational system: In the twentieth century there are native and mission Churches, intimate with and distant from the state, rich and poor, persistent and reformist Churches, national and foreign educational traditions, complete and, in looking at functions and the structure of grades from the elementary to the tertiary sphere, incomplete educational offerings.

The European countries are, like the United States, conspicuous in that they received their national cultures from a common Christian European history, differed from one another in it, and more or less strongly emancipated themselves from it. Where the system of separation between state and Church was realized on the model of the Weimar Constitution, there was no occasion to support a complete educational offering under church auspices; it sufficed if Catholic interests could be assured within the state educational system.[23] In this case talk of the state-school monopoly made no real sense. If the constitutional situation was, as in France, hostile to the Church—laïcité—its educational power can still be taken into account indirectly.[24]

In the United States matters were different from the start. Here, in order to allow the Catholic immigrants in a society at first unfriendly to Catholics a church education, a Catholic educational system free of the state had to be constructed. From the basis of the local ecclesiastical primary schools there arose from the second half of the nineteenth century an educational system which, supported by a native Church, was stamped in the national American educational system, and provided a functional and, in regard to grades, complete educational offering. Up to the 1960s it showed itself equal to the financial demands. The great majority of North American Catholics in this century received, partly or entirely, their education in Catholic institutions.[25]

---

[21] LThK, second supplementary volume (Freiburg 1967), 401f.

[22] This circumstance was called to the attention of the director general of UNESCO by Pope Paul VI (cf. AAS 63[1971], 837f.).

[23] Cf. A. von Campenhausen, op. cit., and T. Oppermann, op. cit., 35ff.

[24] Cf. W. Schultze, ed., Schulen in Europa II A, 574, 583f.

In what follows, these institutions in European countries and North America are described on the respective grades of the national educational system. A defining first section, which, for reasons of uniform understanding of the total educational plan, is oriented to the German Federal Republic,[26] is then followed by a historically treated second section.

PRESCHOOL AREA

In the elementary area the teaching methods of early childhood lie outside the family, that is, the institutions supplementary to family training after the completing of the third year of life to the beginning of school. Here the children should obtain the training necessary for their internal and external growth. In this regard two viewpoints are in the foreground: in one of them there is an attempt to foster the process of child development beyond the possibilities available at home—"compensatory education"; in the other, to achieve a gradual transition to learning in school—"preschool."

The legal rules to which the institutions of the elementary area of the various nations are subject are quite different: While countries such as Belgium, France, and England have incorporated preschool into the educational system—France considers it an integrating component of the primary school system—the Netherlands and Italy regulate the preschool system separately in law. The responsibility for the elementary area lies partly with the officials of the educational system, partly, especially in the Scandinavian countries, with the social offices.

In the industrialized states education in the elementary area is, to be sure, systematically organized, but, apart from preschool classes, it is not obligatory and also not altogether under the auspices of the state and locality. Especially in Belgium, Denmark, the Netherlands, Italy, Switzerland, the German Federal Republic, and the United States, institutions of the elementary area are overwhelmingly under free auspices.

---

[25] New Catholic Encyclopedia 5, 141ff. ("United States: 20th Century").

[26] Bund-Länder-Kommission für Bildungsplanung, Bildungsgesamtplan I, 2d ed. (Stuttgart 1974), 18ff.

The proportion of children who attend a preschool institution varies from country to country. The highest numbers of attendance for children from age three to age five are recorded by Belgium (over 90 percent), the Netherlands and France (over 70 percent). Among the five-year-olds the numbers for Belgium and the Netherlands are more than 90 percent.[27]

The Church's organization for the poor and the school has traditionally cared for children in need of aid and without parents, in the area of formation and looking after little children; the kindergarten movement established by Fröbel in the middle of the nineteenth century then favored pedagogic initiatives in the ecclesiastical sphere also. Religious institutes, parishes, and welfare societies became operators of kindergartens, and, where there were no contrary legal regulations, as above all in France after 1886, the most important operators of preschool institutions. Since the Second World War these institutions have come ever more under state supervision—regulations on minimal demands in size and in the qualification of personnel—and were subsidized by public means; nevertheless, they were able to preserve a considerable freedom of movement in their pedagogical organization.

If the older kindergarten pedagogy paid attention especially to the care of the children by games and common activities to relieve the mothers and described its theory on the basis of the natural process of maturation in the course of life, it recently regarded more carefully the learning possibilities of the earliest years of life and tried purposefully and systematically to use it for the development of youthful strengths. In the Catholic sphere Maria Montessori had preceded this trend, but she had less impact in Germany than she had in Italy, Switzerland, and the United States; modern early pedagogy continues the beginnings made by Montessori and extends them from the cognitive and emotional to the total social development of the children. The education practice of church kindergartens stands today in the field of tension of various claims and far-reaching but often inadequate criticism: on the one hand it should admit the results of early pedagogy, especially of the psychology of learning without the pressure of school achievement, and on the other it should take into account the aims of antiauthoritarian education, and finally find a way where religious education is practicable when, as in the German Federal Republic, children from homes of the most varied denominations are accepted.[28]

---

[27] B. Trouillet, Die Vorschulerziehung in neun europäischen Ländern (=Dokumentationen zum in- und ausländischen Schulwesen 8), ed. by DIPF, 2d ed. (Weinheim and Berlin 1968), 208ff.

PRIMARY AND SECONDARY SPHERES

The primary sphere includes the first organized and obligatory instruction suited to a school. It can last between three years—lower grades of the ten-class general educational polytechnical secondary school of the German Democratic Republic—and six years, in England and Sweden. Apart from the special schools of the Communist states, the rule prevails that in the primary sphere all children in the first grade are taught in common; in Germany the unitary elementary school, regularly of four years, has been maintained since 1920 on constitutional grounds. The idea is to provide pupils with a common body of knowledge before they continue their education. The early pedagogy, intent on individualization, required a proper continuation in the primary sphere; but no way has yet been found to satisfactorily unite the principle of grouping and individualization with the principle of year-classes over several years.

The secondary sphere I includes methods of education which are subject to the full-time school obligation and in general embraces the fifth to tenth school year. At the end of the secondary sphere I lies a school-qualifying conclusion with a partly selective, partly distributive function.

Thus the tension-filled aims such as orientation, individualization of educational offerings, and avoidance of premature fastening to a definite educational program in the secondary sphere II rank as the common pedagogical task of the educational methods here summarized.

Considerable educational-political explosive power has adhered in the years since the Second World War in Western European countries to the question whether secondary sphere I should be organized in one grade ("integrated") or in columns of an "articulated" school system. Behind this are concealed controversial sociopolitical, pedagogical, education-economic, and political-structural issues, which became decisively effective in various countries in varying combinations.

Secondary sphere II embraces in increased variety and diversity educational courses which are based on secondary sphere I and usually follow it immediately. They are either vocational and full-time; part-time with practical instruction; concerned with purely academic preparation; or they have a double function. In the last case, they either allow a student to graduate and to proceed to the tertiary sphere, or they certify attendance and permit the student to earn a living.

---

[28] Cf. G. Hundertmarck in L. Roth, ed., Handlexikon zur Erziehungswissenschaft (Munich 1976), 111ff.

If in secondary sphere I organizational integration and multiple linking are posed as alternatives, then the multilayered problems in secondary sphere II require a different treatment. In connection with the inclusion of vocational practice in education there is the question of the duration, but especially of the harmonizing and coordinating; the question of the relations of basic and special education (often confused with the question of the proportion of "general education" to vocational education) leads into institutional as well as into curricular problems (education by grades); the question of the equality of vocational and general education is today aspired to partly through the elimination of the separation between the two systems and through facilitation of the transition, partly through special encouragement of the proper character of the vocational sphere of education as an autonomous and justified system in secondary sphere II. The question of equality also plays a role in the admission to the university curriculum, which possesses a strategic function not only for the total educational and business system of a country but also for the life chances of a person leaving secondary sphere II. To the extent that the completion of secondary sphere II not only ends an extended basic education and not only qualifies for entry into the earning world, but also opens up access to study in the tertiary sphere, its function is by no means clearly defined. On the one hand it represents only one of several conditions which must be present if one wishes to continue to study. In the Soviet Union, for example, only the qualification for competition for a study position is connected with the completion of the ten-year school, whose concluding ninth and tenth classes are regarded as "complete middle school," that is, secondary grade II, but the distribution of the study position depends on further conditions, including the annual numbers in the state education and labor force plan, the results of the examination for entrance into the university, and so forth. The former German regulation which required both the school-leaving examination as well as the general qualification for the university constituted the other extreme. The older rule on the school-leaving examination had to be modified from the mid-1960s for the study courses or the university positions for which more applications were available than could be accommodated. This is being done with the aid of a central admission office.[29]

The Church's exertions and interests in education had lost their institutional basis in most European states because of the complete devastation produced by the Enlightenment and secularization. Where other means did not succeed, the Church had to substitute for what had been lost in popular breadth (ecclesiastical inspection of the school system) and pedagogical concepts (Jesuit schools) by means of specific education and caritas. Hence there appeared under the auspices of clerical orders educational institutions in the area, traditionally reserved to the control of the home, of the education of girls as well as the care and instruction of the handicapped. Concern for ecclesiastical recruits was expressed in the promotion of boarding schools of humanistic style and in the founding of regionally important boarding schools at state humanistic high schools.

In the Netherlands there developed an unusually strong denominational educational system: it had been desired by both the Calvinist and the Catholic side and was not only formally assured in 1917—"the imparting of instruction is free"—but also with regard to the claim to state support. A law of 1920 made basic schools of a public and a private character financially equal. In 1960 a secondary school law followed this. Similarly favorable conditions exist in Belgium, where more than half of all students receive instruction in Catholic schools. Spain also, since the Franco era, offers the Catholic Church a wide influence: it is socially acknowledged as an educational power, consults with state tribunals on educational problems, imparts religious instruction in all schools, possesses a number of its own teaching institutes, and has control of not a few others. In France, of course, as a consequence of the laicism doctrine of the state, the Church is excluded from the public educational system, but privately it is not only tolerated but, since the Fifth Republic, it is also strongly supported. The basis of the favorable relationship between the state and the private school system was the "Rapport Lappie," which in 1959 saw to the passage of a law which permitted the state to conclude support agreements with private schools. In 1965 at least every fourth secondary pupil attended a private institution, most of them a Catholic one.[30] [29] Cf. H. Scheuerl, Gliederung des deutschen Schulwesens (=Deutscher Bildungsrat, Gutachten und Studien der Bildungskommission, 2) (Stuttgart 1968); S.B. Robinsohn, ed., Schulreform im gesellschaftlichen Prozess. Ein interkultureller Vergleich I (Bundesrepublik Deutschland by C. Kuhlmann, DDR by K.D. Mende, Soviet Union by D. Glowka) (Stuttgart 1970).

---

[30] W. Schultze, Schulen in Europa I (Germany), II (France, Netherlands, Belgium), III (Spain, Italy).

The special German type of denominational school in the public school area, that is, the primary and secondary school conducted under state auspices but denominationally defined in personnel and program, has, since the second half of the 1960s, been merged into Christian community schools, which could better do justice to the pedagogical and educational-economic demands. The compatibility of these community schools with the constitution was declared by the Supreme Court in the spring of 1976. The compatibility with the principles of Catholic school policy is no longer challenged by the bishops.[31]

In the United States legal and social obstacles to a Catholic education in the framework of the public schools were experienced by the Catholic minority, differently than in Germany. On the other hand, the Catholic parochial school movement that took place led since the second half of the nineteenth century to the construction of an institutional pedagogical substructure for a Catholic educational system, which in 1920 included more than 6,500 primary schools with over 40,000 teachers and 1.7 million pupils.

In 1960 there were already 4.5 million pupils in these schools. Besides the parochial schools, which constituted the greatest number of Catholic primary schools, there were also, chiefly in connection with secondary schools, primary schools under the sponsorship of religious institutes and, in lesser number, also under the sponsorship of lay Catholics—the Montessori schools.

Still greater than in the primary sphere was the growth of Catholic schools in the secondary sphere. If in 1920 there were still little more than 1,500 schools with just about 130,000 pupils, their number had grown in 1960 to almost 2,400 schools with more than 800,000 pupils. The size of schools measured against the number of pupils per school tripled or quadrupled in this period so that more and more secondary schools outgrew the financial and administrative capacities of the parishes and, often under the responsibility of religious institutes, became diocesan schools. (The first central high school arose in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in the 1890s.) Today about 40 percent of all Catholic youth of school age attend a Catholic high school, and this even though their attendance is subject to tuition. In view of the mounting costs of building and maintaining schools, conditioned among other things by the increase of lay teachers, it of course is to be expected that the Catholic school system in the United States can for the present experience no further expansion.

---

[31] For the development of the relations of educational science and school to the Catholic Church see now K. Erlinghagen, "Katholische Kirche und Erziehung und Bildung," G. Gorschenek, ed., Katholiken und ihre Kirche (=G 200–202) (Munich and Vienna 1976), 240ff. (246). Numbers for Catholic school statistics in Kirchliches Handbuch. Amtliches statistiches Jahrbuch der katholischen Kirche Deutschlands, ed. by F. Groner, 23(1944–51), pt. 5. Between 1944 and 1951 the proportion in denominational popular schools in Germany was 86 percent; 58 percent were Catholic.

The educational aims and methods in the Catholic schools developed in close connection with those of the public and non-Catholic schools. They, like these latter, were fixed in the vicissitudes of the national history—World War I, New Deal, World War II, sputnik shock, and the like—and dependent on the intellectual impulses, such as J. Dewey's pragmatism, and social movements like coeducation, the civil rights movement, and so forth.[32] Nevertheless, they gained powerful help from the papal educational teaching, especially the encyclical Divini illius Magistri of Pius XI. The seven goals to which Catholic schools in the United States are directed are a pragmatic combination of general and specific Catholic principles in the educational sphere. Students should be: (1) intelligent Catholics, (2) spiritually vigorous Catholics, (3) cultured Catholics, (4) healthy Catholics, (5) vocational Catholics, (6) social-minded Catholics, (7) American Catholics.[33]

TERTIARY SPHERE

In the tertiary sphere a distinction must be made between universities and instructional places with other professionally qualifying courses—trade schools or higher technical schools, which require as condition of admittance a completion of the secondary sphere II.

The universities have the function of preparing for professional activities which require the employment of scientific knowledge and methods or the capacity for artistic creation. They can but do not have to be places of "research"; where they unite teaching with research, as, for example, the German universities, their rank is higher than if they are specialized technical universities. Modern research in the social and natural sciences is, however, organized more and more outside the tertiary sphere.

In countries with predominant or exclusive auspices of the state the differences of achievement of the universities are indeed less strong than in countries with predominantly free auspices, such as the United States, but the extension of the university sphere set in motion around institutions which were previously to be counted in the secondary sphere II a hitherto unknown process of distinction of level. This process can be employed by state planning and managing for inner classification of "all universities": then new structural classification marks of a uniform university system take the place of the university structure: distinction and classification of courses according to content, duration, completion in more application-oriented and more research-oriented courses with simultaneous coordination of related courses and reciprocal recognition of courses taken and completions. But the distinction of level can also be made institutionally visible and lead to a differentiation of grades within the tertiary sphere.[34]

---

[32] New Catholic Encyclopedia 5, 142–46.

[33] Ibid. Vols. 13, 21.

With the expansion of the tertiary sphere not only is account taken of the change of professional educators and their increasingly greater scientific and technical specialization but also a quantitative problem is answered. It is hoped that the problem of the mounting inquiry about the place of studies on the basis of increasing opportunities of study—free instruction, subsidizing of living costs out of the public means—can be solved by a large number of brief profession-qualifying studies being offered, which can rank partly as "basic studies" for continuing courses, and by establishing more difficult criteria, such as special qualifications for completion of secondary sphere II, brief studies, entrance examinations, and so forth.

Still, education in the tertiary sphere is not confined to the traditional institutions or those recently added in this sphere; it is also imparted by correspondence courses, which in principle enable the participant to qualify from his place of work at the moment. This type of study is most powerfully cultivated in the Communist countries; during the Khruschev era there were in the Soviet Union more students (54.8 percent) in evening and correspondence courses than in day and direct study (45.2 percent).[35]

In the so-called tertiary sphere there were from time immemorial ecclesiastical functions and interests. Through the stormy development of the post-Enlightenment sciences at the universities the older faculty organization, in which theology occupied the first place, was basically upset: in part it fell into a peripheral situation, in part it had to leave the universities altogether, as at the Université de France. But other goals of the older universities in Catholic countries also changed: first and most important, the cultivation of ecclesiastical and secular sciences on the basis of the Catholic world view, then the integrating, oriented to it, of the special branches of science through the scholarly exertion of the academicians, and finally also the representation of the sciences in the undecided question about an ethically and religiously acceptable meaning of life. The situation at the universities worsened so powerfully here and there that certain universities, according to N. A. Luyten, had to rank as "antireligious fortresses."

---

[34] Council of Europe, Diversification of Tertiary Education (Strasbourg 1974).

[35] O. Anweiler et al., Europäische Bildungssysteme zwischen Tradition und Fortschritt (Mülheim 1971), 137.

For from the second half of the nineteenth century there had begun, as a reaction to the Enlightenment, secularization, and liberal or laicizing state-Church policies, a movement for the "Catholic University," which was active everywhere but especially where an adequate concordat or corresponding other regulation of the domains of research and education of state and Church, standing side by side or mixed together, was lacking. Since in Germany the on the whole positive development of the nineteenth century was continued beyond the era of the Weimar Republic and, apart from the retarding tendencies during the Nazi period, kept up also after the Second World War, in this country there occurred no founding of "Catholic Universities." Since the 1960s the legal position of the civil and ecclesiastical philosophical and theological universities, for example, in Bavaria, has been regulated on the model of the Catholic faculties at the universities.

In the rest of Europe the situation of the Catholic universities is quite different: in France, where there are such universities at Paris, Lille, Angers, Lyon, and Toulouse—the Université de l'Ouest at Angers was founded as early as 1875, originally to cover the need for teachers for the numerous private Catholic schools of western France—there are statutory restrictions through the circumstance that academic degrees—apart from those in theology—may be granted only by the state Université de France, so that the nontheological faculties of the Catholic universities have established themselves as preparatory institutions for the state examinations.

The rank of a national university for Belgium belongs to the ancient and at the same time Catholic University of Louvain, which by virtue of its Philosophical Institute, associated with Cardinal Mercier, was a leader in Neo-Thomistic research and teaching and which through the breadth of its faculties educated about 50 percent of all students in Belgium—in 1970 about 27,000. However, it was not spared the linguistic strife between the Flemings and Walloons and in 1966 had to be divided into two—Louvain and Ottignies.

The most important Catholic university for Spain, that of Navarre at Pamplona, was only founded in 1960 by Opus Dei. Support and direction of this university follow the concordat of 1953, as is true also of the older Catholic universities, for example, Salamanca (1940).

Of special significance for the movement for Catholic universities, appearing in the nineteenth century, is the United States, where today, in addition to a large number of colleges, there are more than thirty-two

Catholic universities; the first of them was founded in 1887 as the Catholic University of America at Washington under the laws of the District of Columbia and two years later was endowed by Leo XIII with papal status by the letter Magni Nobis Gaudii of 7 March 1889.

The first function lay in the extension of theological studies, that is, graduate studies, for priests, who obtained their basic training at one of the 125 so-called colleges or ten seminaries. Ten years later there followed a faculty of philosophical and social sciences, in which even black students were enrolled, and women acquired admission in 1928. The Catholic University was supported by the American episcopal conference and all parishes through annual collections; it retained its center of gravity in the area of graduate studies and in the 1960s had about 5,000 students, including 1,300 priests and 400 religious women, but its capacity was considerably greater.

In 1924 there was an attempt at founding an International Federation of Catholic Universities (IFCU) by the newly established Catholic Universities of Milan (1920) and Nijmegen (1923) and the venerable University of Louvain; through this federation the exchange of experience should be institutionalized across national boundaries and the organizational phases of new foundations facilitated. After an interval produced by the war, cooperation was again resumed from Rome in 1949 and the union itself given a canonical status.[36] Today universities of forty countries in Europe, America, Asia, and Africa are united, each of which must, in order to become a member, have at least three faculties, including one for nontheological studies. In Latin American nations there are more than thirty Catholic universities of the most heterogeneous rank—four alone were founded between 1960 and 1964; the most important is probably the Universidad Católica of Chile, with more than 5,000 students. In Canada there are six Catholic universities; the most important is that of Montreal, with over 20,000 students. For Africa the Catholic University Lovanium, founded by Louvain, could gain importance.[37]

In the course of the twentieth century Asia acquired several Catholic universities through missionary institutes from Europe but especially from North America. The University of Aurora was founded in 1903 by French Jesuits at Zikawei, China, and in 1909 transferred to Shanghai. It included faculties for law, natural sciences, the humanities, and medicine. In 1937 the Religious of the Sacred Heart opened there a division for the higher education of women. At Tientsin in 1922 French Jesuits founded an Institut des Hautes Études, which was officially recognized in 1948 as a university under the name Tsinku. But the greatest national and international importance belonged to the Catholic University of Peking, which, founded in 1924 by American Benedictines at the request of Pius XI, was recognized as a state university under the name Fu Jen as early as 1927, and in 1933 was entrusted to the Society of the Divine Word. The three Chinese universities, which enjoyed great repute through their education and scholarship—Monumenta Serica of Fu Jen and Bulletin de l'Université Aurore—were closed after the Communist seizure of power, and the religious who were not Chinese were expelled. Thus was broken a development to which Teilhard de Chardin had given powerful incentives through his works in the 1920s—discovery of Sinanthropus in 1924. Two Catholic universities—Sophia University at Tokyo in 1913 and Nagoya in 1949—appeared in Japan.[38] At the beginning of the 1960s there were in Asian countries fifteen Catholic universities, whose existence and work were, of course, greatly conditioned by contemporary political circumstances.

---

[36] Apostolic letter Apostolicas Studiorum Universitates, AAS 42(1949), 385.

[37] LThK, second supplementary volume, 395f.

Nevertheless, more important in the long view must have been the function in the contemporary national and regional context—"educational planning"—and the quality of the research as well as its international radiation. In this sense the Second Vatican Council declared in regard to Christian education at universities: Catholic universities must be disseminated and fostered in a suitable manner to the various parts of the world, however, so that "they should be noteworthy not so much for their numbers as for their high standards. Entry to them should be made easy for students of great promise but of modest resources, and especially for those from newly developed countries" (Declaration on Christian Education, ART. 10).

CONTINUING EDUCATION (EDUCATION OF ADULTS)

In addition to and following the three or four educational areas a broad field is opening for the resumption of learning, which has an abundance of goals, forms, institutions, and organizational conditions. In recent years this field of learning is considered an autonomous and equivalent educational area—éducation permanente, life-long learning, recurrent education. Here not only interests beside and beyond the professional should be cultivated, but also social desires of advancement satisfied and, more and more, possibilities be offered for reviving professional knowledge and preparedness. Since rapid social change, the progress of science, and technical progress let professional knowledge become outdated and bring enduring changes in the professional sphere, it has become necessary to carry the phase of the "school year" far beyond the entire professional life. Today one sees in constant further improvement the continuation, completion, and renewal of the educational process in the elementary, primary, secondary, and tertiary spheres, and also an alternative to these.[39]

---

[38] A. Mulders, Missionsgeschichte. Die Ausbreitung des katholischen Glaubens (Regensburg 1960), 472, and S. Delacroix, ed., Histoire Universelle des Missions Catholiques 3 (Paris 1958), 273.

The area of constant further improvement can be brought, in accord with its multifunctionality, only with difficulty under uniform institutional rules. In countries where various social groups, groups of the economy, the Churches, the communities, and so forth, participate in the educational function of this sphere, it is necessary to produce an indispensable minimum in community through local and supralocal collaboration of the agents of the institutions of further development or through the bringing together of previously separately pursued educational aims, especially of the professional and the general political, cultural, and other areas. Recently the attempt has been made, in the framework of uniform curricula and on the basis of a legal "educational leave," to grant to the professionally related education a certain preference and to orient the structure of the further improvement sphere to professional requirements—accumulation of course credits, certificates, demands on the educational personnel, and so forth.

Catholic adult education in Europe was a reply to the challenge of the first Enlightenment, which varied according to respective historical conditions. Its history is still scarcely investigated, although more so in Germany and Austria (I. Zangerle). In Germany Catholic adult education was set up as a popular enlightenment with an apologetic purpose and from the middle of the nineteenth century entered the circle of popular educational movements, where it sought to impart in "schools for adults" a "general Christian instruction," as in the Katholische Verein Deutschlands of 1848. After the first aim—the gathering of the Catholic parts of the population into unions and associations—had been accomplished and its ideological and political consolidation against liberalism had succeeded, the second aim became prominent in view of the Kulturkampf, namely, to contribute to the formation of consciousness and to defend the status achieved. With the relaxing of the danger, this aim decayed and gave way to cultivation of popular education until, under the direction of A. Heinen and the influence of the Hohenrodt League, new impulses flowed into the Popular Union for Catholic Germany—[39] E. King et al., Post-Compulsory Education, A New Analysis in Western Europe (London and Beverly Hills 1974), 44.

---

"intensive" or "formative" popular education. The period between the First and the Second World Wars is characterized by exertions for new organizational forms of cooperation between the Catholic associations and societies—Central Educational Committee of All Catholic Societies of Germany (ZBA)—and new concepts of education—in 1925 the first Catholic Congress of Popular Education at Paderborn; to be sure, the Catholic work of education remained within the bounds of its tradition and its sociophilosophical, historically scarcely specified principles and opened itself up not at all or only weakly to the historical reality of the political society of its time. Thus, facing Nazi domination, it remained politically isolated and was abolished together with the rest of social Catholicism—in 1933 dissolution of the ZBA. After 1945 Catholic adult education first joined the surviving institutional remains of the prewar period—independent evening studies at home, and so forth—after 1950, stimulated by the example of the Protestant academies, in Catholic academies, which understood themselves as places for "the dialogue of the Church with the world," in the words of B. Hanssler. The former orientation to the education of workers, farmers, and artisans was not thereby abandoned, but perhaps changed in favor of a strengthened inclusion of groups related to the intellectual.[40] Finally there occurred the construction of local educational works, which competed with the popular universities and other institutions and often played an important role within the local or regional educational offerings. From the juxtaposition of various Catholic educational institutions ensued not only a need for organizational agreement in the inner-ecclesiastical field, for example, in 1957 the Federated Workers' Community for Catholic Adult Education (BAG); there resulted also the necessity of reaching agreement with the competing institutions of continuing education. A powerful impulse to this came, on the part of the state, from new regulations of the public subsidies, a second from the pedagogical and adult education discussion conducted under the catchword "emancipation" since the mid-1960s, and a third impulse, still hardly to be evaluated in its consequences, from the Second Vatican Council. The pastoral constitution on the Church in the Modern World accelerated the end of the older integrally conceived Catholic adult education in Germany and caused a revolutionary consideration of new ways of adult education under Catholic auspices.

---

[40] F. Messerschmid, "Geschichte der Katholischen Akademien," F. Pöggeler, ed., Handbuch der Erwachsenenbildung 4 (Stuttgart 1975), 208ff.

In Austria this development was already indicated since the "radical new beginning" of 1945 on the basis of other historical assumptions and especially of the line of conflict moving in Catholicism itself between social status and class-oriented thought.[41] The Federated Workers' Community for Catholic Adult Education in Austria (BAKEB), founded in 1963, belongs, like its German sister union (BAG), to the European Federation for Adult Education (FEECA), founded in 1963, in which cooperation among the German-speaking members is especially close.

In the United States the Church's adult education was up to the Second World War little more than a part of the traditional social and mission work. The new era of the adult education movement began in the 1950s and reached certain high points in the 1960s. They were connected with the consolidation of the Church's outside and assistance services, the spread of the ideas of adult education, and the initiatives of the Second Vatican Council. Three currents now determined the Churches' adult education: the ecumenical movement, the involvement of the Churches with the national problems of the United States—poverty, racism—appearances of secularization in the formerly Puritan-oriented public. The model of the Churches' adult education, which was also adopted by Catholic adult education, was the Indiana Plan, developed in 1954 by P. Bergevin and McKinley and published in 1970, which tested new principles of the education of mature students in a scientifically accompanied series of seminars. With the adaptation of the plan proceeded a consolidation of the organization; in 1958 the National Catholic Education Association was founded, which in 1959 published the Handbook of Catholic Adult Education. The social extent of the Church's adult education in the United States is considerable; 12 percent of the participants in adult education took part in 1962 in the courses offered by churches and synagogues; a total of 3.2 million.[42]

Catholic adult education in Europe and the United States will be powerfully affected in the future by the trends which appeared at the Third International UNESCO Conference; there a worldwide development for an integrated, publicly responsible, internationally solidified, functional, scientifically based, and professionalized adult education was noted. Whether and in what form such peculiarly Catholic adult education will maintain itself in such trends will depend on many circumstances, such as: whether the upsetting impact of the Second Vatican Council will be followed by a phase of critical and believing reconstruction, whether the next generation of educators of adults recognizes this task as its own and possesses the necessary prerequisites for it, and finally, whether the political and social circumstances for an at least partly self-determined activity of free agents will be maintained or will have to be secured anew.

---

[41] Cf. I. Zangerle, "Geschichte der katholischen Erwachsenenbildung," F. Pöggler, ed., op. cit. (n. 40), 208ff.

[42] F. Laack, Die amerikanische Bildungswirklichkeit. Idee, Stand und Probleme der Adult Education in den USA (Cologne 1976), 88, 150, 154ff.

Conditions for Catholic Education in Other Areas of the World

In contradistinction to Europe and North America, where the ecclesiastical educational system was active within the national educational traditions and was operated or controlled by native Churches, in the other regions of the world other and often very complicated circumstances exist. On the basis of the statistical situation only a survey of the schools and universities of the primary to the tertiary sphere is here given; again among them the part current in ecclesiastical sponsorship stands in the center of interest. It acts as representative of the "Catholic educational system."[43]

Latin America differs in a specific way from the only recently decolonized states of Africa and Asia. On the one hand the instruction remains oriented to the leading families at the schools of the countries of their origin;[44] on the other hand, cultural fusions and admixtures of races have occurred which have permitted the rise of a special Latin American society and proper national cultures, whose development perspective seems in no sense about to come to terms with the Western or Communist industrial nations.[45] Seen as a whole, the efficacy of the institutionalized educational system was slight: every other inhabitant of the Latin American continent is illiterate, the shares of the gross national product destined for the educational system are less than those of the industrialized nations. To be sure, the portions have gradually increased since the 1950s. For example, Mexico in 1958 invested 1.5

---

[43] The statistics in this part refer, unless otherwise noted, always to the Catholic educational system under private or "free" auspices; cf. also CIEO, Études et Documents no. 5: The Situation of Catholic Education in the Various Continents (Brussels 1969).

[44] For the Catholic universities see the section "Tertiary Sphere," above.

[45] Cf. E. L. Stehle, Indio-Latein Amerika (Düsseldorf and Oberhaussen 1971); A. García, "Die lateinamerikanische Theologie der Befreiung, I" Internationale Katholische Zeitschrift, 2d year (1973), no. 2, 400ff.; R. Vekemans, "Die lateinamerikanische Theologie der Befreiung II. Ein Literaturbericht," ibid., D., 434ff.

percent of the national product in education, in 1963 it was 2.7 percent and in 1966 3.1 percent.[46]

The Church's historical role in the educational system is seen in the strong share of church institutions in the school and university area. Of course, for the longest time they were not attuned to the developmental needs of the country and in function and organization they were both incomplete and unbalanced. The defects of the public educational system were uninterruptedly expressed in the ecclesiastical educational system: there was a lack of institutions for mass education—"eradication of illiteracy"—for professional education, for the training of middle-level administrative personnel, and so forth. Thirteen percent of the pupils attended Catholic institutions. The highest percentage, over 25 percent, was reached in Bolivia and Chile, followed by Brazil, Colombia, Ecuador, and Guatemala, with from 20 to 15 percent, then by Argentina, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, and Venezuela, with 15 to 10 percent, and, finally, with less than 10 percent in Costa Rica, Honduras, and Paraguay. The religious instruction of the mass of those of school age is not assured and can only partly be accomplished by extra-school institutions. The connection of the school system with the state means only in a few cases regular subsidies for building and maintenance costs, as especially in Argentina, Chile, and Surinam; in other countries there is no established financial help, for example, in Colombia, except for the Catholic universities, Ecuador, Paraguay, and Peru. Since the increased social tensions of the 1950s and the revolutionary disturbances of the 1960s, the Latin American Church has powerfully exerted itself for the expanding and renewing of its educational commitments.[47] In 1963 the Permanent Secretariat of the Latin American Episcopal Conference at Bogotá (CELAM) was reorganized. It has prepared the realization of the conciliar documents Gaudium et spes and the Declaration on Christian Education on the Latin American continent. The outcome of its work was the resolution "Human Development," issued in 1968 by the Second General Assembly of the Latin American Bishops at Medellín, in which is said: "Latin America seems to be still living under the tragic sign of underdevelopment, which separates our brethren not only from the enjoyment of material goods but also from their own human realization." Education, hence the achieving of Catholic schools, is defined in this situation as the "decisive factor in the development of the continent." The direction in which the development should go—the "total development of the person and of all persons"—must be made possible and encouraged by education; in view of the magnitude of the task, systematic education by means of schools or colleges is not enough; so far as Catholic schools take part in education, they must admit all social classes without discrimination—"democratization." The Catholic school should be open to its local and Latin American environment, pursue its adaptation and reorganization, be open to ecumenical dialogue, and become the cultural, social, and intellectual center within society. In an effort to achieve the goal of an open-minded and democratic Catholic school, the Episcopal Conference of Medellín supported the right to free choice of school and suitable financial contribution.[48] The Christian educational impulses are no longer communicated only through canon law or theology but through sociology and educational planning.

---

[46] P. Latapí, Diagnostico Educativo Nacional, Centro de Estudios Educativos (Mexico City 1964). The relatively high state of illiteracy must be seen in relation to the increase of population and the contemporary decrease of the proportion (cf. also UNESCO, World Survey (n. 1), Vol. 5, 66f. Between 1960 and 1966 the proportion of the school population in the total population rose from 14 to 18 percent.

[47] Cf. J. R. Vaccaro, "Latin America," in CIEO, Études de Documents no. 5 (n. 43 above), Doc. 3.3.

The significance of this document is great: It places the national organizations of the Latin American Church under a common reform, even, in each case according to the situation, revolutionary program, brings it, again according to the circumstances, into conflict with state offices, and sets up for broad circles of the population not only a sign of hope but also a standard by which the actions of the ecclesiastical agents of education can be measured.

The educational system supported by the Churches of Africa is due, as in Asia, to Christianity, which in wide areas accompanied European colonialism and imperialism. The European missionary institutes represented a European program of education, which reflected the proper character and interest of the colonial power of the time, "displaced education."[49] The European face of educational policy is still especially visible in Africa.[50]

France's mission civilisatrice demanded a centralized and laicized school system also in the colonies. British colonial power aimed at an African society by means of the principle of "indirect rule," employed vernacular languages, and encouraged in its sphere private educators, especially mission societies. The Belgians promoted Catholic mission schools in the Congo for the aims of a controlled social life and of an economy that would supplement the home economy. The training of administrative personnel, which meant little to the total Belgian colonial policy, did not take place; an exception was the training of clergy. For the rest it was typical of most African areas that only a basic schooling was allowed to the blacks. In South Africa, South West Africa, and Rhodesia must be added the special circumstances of a white Africanism, which sought to maintain itself ethnically, socially, and politically against a native and partly united black majority and subordinated the educational policy also to this end.

---

[48] Die Kirche in der gegenwärtigen Umwandlung Lateinamerikas (see n. 18).

[49] See, besides the titles given in n. 38, especially H. Jedin, "Weltmission und Kolonialismus," Saeculum, 1958, 393ff.; M. Merle, Les Églises Chrétiennes et la Décolonisation (Paris 1967); S. Neill, Colonialism and Christian Missions (London 1966).

[50] Also from the sociological viewpoint: T. Hanf, Erziehung und politischer Wandel in Schwarzafrika (n. 2).

The situation of the Catholic educational system changed[51] when, after the Second World War, the epoch of the decolonization of Asia and Africa began, and new leading powers with new methods and aims appeared. In addition to the United States there were the Soviet Union and from the 1960s the People's Republic of China, as well as a few smaller Communist states, such as Cuba and the People's Republic of Vietnam. Arab nationalism in the Near and Middle East consolidated the position of Islam, and the political and cultural influence of Europe declined. In this age of total change there appeared in the former colonial territories two currents, both equally unfavorable to the Catholic educational system: the first, more cultural and political, was awaking nationalism; the second, more economic and sociopolitical, was the policy of development. "Nation building" and socioeconomic development became the goals of official policy; the educational system should also contribute to its realization. More than once nation building was based on precolonial—and this usually means non-Christian—traditions; also the ideologies with which the policy of development, especially that of a Marxist orientation, were supposed to be supported proved to be hostile to the Christian. Instruction in European languages, especially in the primary sphere, was restricted, special proofs of training were made obligatory on the teaching personnel, the legal position of the Catholic school system became insecure. If "nation building" and development are understood as the entire political function in the hand or under the control of the state, then it appears inevitable that the freedom to found and maintain schools, on the basis of which the missionary system had developed, had to be curtailed.

The African states rising to sovereignty were not inclined to let the status quo of the colonial educational system continue. As soon as they saw the means and ways to liquidate it they did so. Still, it did not yet succeed everywhere. Some nations took the school into the state's monopoly and gave to the Catholic private schools, in addition to the state schools, a legal status of their own—Zaire, Tanzania, Burundi, Ruanda—others decreed, as a sign of the state's school monopoly, the suppression or assumption of control of private Catholic schools by the state—Republic of Congo, Guinea, the Central African Empire, Sudan, Malawi, Ghana before 1967, and most recently the revolutionary socialist states of Ethiopia, Mozambique, and Somalia.

---

[51] Cf. M. Ekwa, "Africa," CIEO, Études et Documents no. 5, Doc. 3.2, and the report based on Ekwa: Catholic Education in the Service of Africa, Report of the Panafrican Catholic Education Conference (August 1965).

The situation of the Catholic school system at the beginning of the 1960s, for which there are statistics, was as follows in Africa: The Catholic proportion in the total African population then amounted to ca. 10 percent—25 out of 270 million. Of African pupils, every third went to a Catholic school. In the individual states these averages differed greatly: Of fifty-six states nine had a Catholic proportion in their population of more than 40 percent, thirty of less than 10 percent. Hence there was in only a few states a developed and capable school system, especially in the former Belgian Congo, but Catholic schools, wherever they existed, performed as much as two-thirds of their services for non-Catholics and were an important site of the encounter of non-Christians with Christians of various denominations, especially with Catholics. As special problems, finally, the following presented themselves: number and quality of teachers, their missionary motivation, their situation in regard to payment—only a few states, such as Zaire, have the means and the intention to pay salary supplements to the regular teacher salaries in Catholic schools—and the conscious share of Catholic schools in nation building and development.

Such questions were treated at regional conferences since the spring of 1967 and placed under the express command to base Catholic education on the principles stated in the conciliar texts, as well as concretize these principles in the light of the special African problems.

The strengthening of the racial unrest and of the nationalist movement in the white-dominated Apartheid states of the south and southwest has since 1976 led the Catholic schools, despite all repressive measures, to depart from the state policy of racial separation and to open their doors to pupils of all races.

In the Near and Middle East, as regards the religious situation, Catholics are an express minority and face an uncommonly complicated situation.[52] The countries of this part of the world belong mostly to Islam—the states of the Arab League—partly to Orthodoxy—Greece and Cyprus—or to Judaism—Israel; only one state has a considerable Catholic proportion in the total population—Lebanon. In this area in the mid-1960s a half-million pupils attended Catholic schools, a number which, meanwhile, especially after the destruction of Beirut and many Christian localities, has probably declined considerably. Christianity in this part of the world contains two elements—a missionary and a native—Maronites, Copts, Chaldeans, Orthodox. Both were or are, each in its own way, active in the educational sphere. The native and mostly rural worshipping communities have for centuries given instruction in language and literature in order to maintain their cultic-religious integrity in the midst of a foreign-speaking and foreign-believing environment—instruction under the mulberry tree on a stone. Mission communities aspired to European educational standards and soon became the urban center of attraction for non-Catholic pupils. In Lebanon the complete and well attended Catholic schools were recognized and subsidized by the state.

---

[52] Cf. also I. Maroun, "Near and Middle East," CIEO, Études et Documents no. 5., Doc. 3.1.

The problems of the Catholic school system of today agree in much with those which occur in Africa and have to do with the historical burden of the former colonially useful institutions, with the orientation to European educational standards, not least with the claim to partial independence vis-à-vis the state school system. The stresses of the colonial period are seen in Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia, and Libya, and will, if at all, only then be eliminated when the native population again asks about the good services of mission schools and is allowed to ask. In this way the political aspect is indicated: In socialist Arabic countries Catholic schools were in many places abolished. In the other nations of the Islamic world they are at least subject to pressure, not least through the coordination practice of the Arab UNESCO, the regional branch of UNESCO formed by the Arab League, which strives for the regional uniformity of teaching and learning to the disadvantage of the Catholic school system. It is self-evident that under such conditions the principles of the council can only with difficulty be employed and developed in the Catholic educational sphere and all depends on whether the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, rules of the United Nations, the Charter of UNESCO on non-discrimination in questions of education and teaching are observed by the states which once agreed to them.

Most difficult of all is the situation of the Catholic educational system under the conditions in Asia. Of the seventeen countries evaluated in the 1968 report of the CIEO,[53] only the Philippines may be regarded as a Catholic country—the Catholic proportion is more than 80 percent—

---

[53] Cf. W. Perfecto, "Asia," CIEO, Études et Documents no. 5., Doc. 3.4.

Macao and Vietnam just reach 10 percent, all the others are far less. India, for example, in 1966 estimated 60 million pupils and students, of whom 1.8 million attended Catholic educational institutions—860,000 were themselves Catholic, hence less than half of those who were in these schools. The figure of 50,000 pupils and students in Catholic institutions given for Cambodia, out of a total of 650,000, is surely out of date since the seizure of power by the Communists.

The political changes on the map of Asia since the late 1940s have worsened the situation for the Catholics more and more.[54] Even where the Communists did not come to power, the Catholic educational system can develop only a small part of the impact to which it is destined. Often the non-Catholic environment demands that the missionary and pastoral character of the Catholic schools be suppressed; in Islamic lands, like Egypt and Pakistan, or Buddhist countries "ethics" or even a non-Catholic religion must be taught. If, as in the Philippines, thirty of one hundred pupils in the primary and secondary sphere take part in Catholic religious instruction, this is an extremely favorable condition for the Asian area. In some countries maintenance costs for Catholic schools are subsidized by the government, since institutions do not yet exist; in this context strict controls are ordinarily exercised. In Malaysia and Singapore the government even appoints the teaching personnel in agreement with the ecclesiastical authorities.

The range of Catholic schools is of importance regionally rather than socially; true, they partly penetrate deeply into areas not reached by the government, but they affect only the upper strata. Since the Second World War not a few of today's leading personalities attended Catholic schools. The future of these schools is seen less in quantitative expansion than in an enhancement of quality.

Among the aims is the substitution of European by qualified native teachers and the adaptation of native cultural traditions, then the recognizable tying of the educational work of Catholic schools into the development program of the respective governments. At the same time this means recognition of differentiated services for the Church: from the religious education of Catholic children to collaboration in a formation, worthy of human beings, of the social circumstances in the particular country.[55]

---

[54] Cf. for the China mission: A. Mulders, Missionsgeschichte (n. 38), 472f.

[55] The discussion on the services of the Church, by which the question of educational offerings is also affected, today finds a loud echo in the framework of missiology (cf. also J. M. Van Engelen, "Tendenzen in der Missiologie der Gegenwart," Internationale katholische Zeitschrift, 3d year (1974), no. 3, 230ff.

CHAPTER 13

*Information and the Mass Media

Among those social changes which affected the Church's activity in essential points in the twentieth century were the developments in the field of mass communication. True, the Church and journalism always stood in certain reciprocal relations, and the critical confrontation with the press as it was becoming free had already started in the first decades of the nineteenth century, for example, under Gregory XVI.[1] However, the twentieth century first produced that full development of those "instruments of social communication"—the Vatican linguistic usage since 1963—which are summarized under the notion of mass media or means of mass communication: to the modern press in its forms as informing and opinion making daily and weekly with a large circulation, recreational press, and specialist press have been added the cinema, radio, and television. Their technical development, as in general the industrialization of publicity production, evoked also the development of new agents of public communications offerings which caused new markets to appear: phonograph records, recording tape, eight-millimeter film, video disk, and, not to be forgotten, the paperback, which is changing the book market.

Since the turn of the century the Church saw or sees itself facing essentially five important phenomena and developments in mass communication with which it must come to terms; for changes in the mass communication system of particular nations, of entire cultural groups, and in individual cases even of "world society" affect the activity of the Church, especially in its mandate to preach and in its pastoral commission. These five points are: (1) the decline, in some countries the disappearance, of the "opinion press"; (2) the new, so-called audiovisual media—cinema, radio, television; (3) the grasping of totalitarian political systems for the publicity institutions in various countries; (4) the completely new tasks and opportunities which result for the use of communications means in the underdeveloped countries; and (5) the disintegration of the "Catholic public" in countries or cultural groups where this concept of practical journalism,[2] but also of pastoral work, had been used for decades with some justification. As a sixth point, which however arose not against the Church but from the Church as a reaction to the journalistic opposition, the organizational and, recently, theoretical confrontation of the Church with mass communication deserves special notice.

---

* Michael Schmolke

[1] Cf., for example, even though outdated, L. Bethleem, La Presse (Paris 1928); also, for the sake of the contemporary sources, R. Pesch, Die kirchlich-politische Presse der Katholiken in der Rheinprovinz vor 1848 (Mainz 1966); M. Schmolke, Die schlechte Presse. Katholiken und Publizistik zwischen "Katholik" und "Publik" 1821–1968 (Münster 1971), and for the Protestant side, despite the misleading title, K. W. Bühler, Presse und Protestantismus in der Weimarer Republik (Witten 1970).

[2] "Journalism" is used as a generic term for any public and actual social communication, hence also for its pretechnical forms; it is then only feasible to speak of mass communication if social communication is effected by means of the modern, technically conditioned media—press, film, radio, and television.

As useful as these categories are for the analysis of our theme, still they are not all, on the basis of their differing time dimensions, suited for the historical classification of the subject; they will appear in various sections as aspects of new problems.

The Catholic Claim and the "Colorless Press"

If the Catholic discussion of journalism in the nineteenth century was predominantly determined by the struggle against the "bad press"—mauvaise presse, stampa perversa, stampa negativa—the early twentieth century brought a new enemy: more correctly, the knowledge that, in addition to the "bad," that is, the liberal, socialist, and occasionally even Protestant press, a new form of newspaper had appeared—the "colorless press." The Catholic press, as the only "good press," was, to be sure, respected by many Catholic critics only as the lesser evil,[3] but it still had gained some noteworthy initial successes in the last third of the century that was ending. Proud of enterprises such as De Tijd (1845), Kölnische Blätter (1860; from 1869 Kölnische Volkszeitung), Germania (1871), or La Croix (from 1883 as a daily), for some time it was overlooked that meanwhile a new type of newspaper had appeared—the informative newspaper, presse d'information, which, differing from the classical type of the nineteenth century, the "opinion newspaper," abandoned partisanship or clear ideological lines. The Catholic press, on the contrary, was conceivable only as an "opinion press"; also the many small papers, which the statistics of founding of Catholic newspapers show to have increased during the Kulturkampf[4] or a little later as foundations of local or regional "press associations," especially in

---

[3] J. Lukas, Die Presse, ein Stück moderner Versimpelung (Regensburg 1867), 116: "The press as it has sprouted up today, is a great evil; our Catholic press is something good because it is the lesser evil."

[4] Cf. M. Schmolke, "Zur Gliederung der katholischen Pressegeschichte Deutschlands," Communicatio Socialis (=CS) 3(1970), 311–27.

Bavaria and Austria,[5] took care of further growth, were, despite their character as local papers, opinion newspapers. In the United States (The Sun, 1833; The New York Herald, 1835), in France (La Presse and Le Siècle, 1836), and in England (Daily Telegraph and Courier, 1855), newspapers "for all," which in order to achieve the widest possible circulation not only lowered their price but also renounced partisanship, had existed the longest.[6] In Germany the first newspapers of this sort occasionally appeared from 1871, using the title, or element in the title, of "general advertiser." The idea soon had an unpleasant connotation. The general advertising press lacked staunchness, and this is what constituted its "colorlessness." The fact that the "colorless press" was a publishing success, that, in regard to the issues, only with it did the age of the mass press begin, only made it more suspect.

The general advertisers were the "bad press" of a new sort, which were regularly condemned in Germany from 1889 at the general Catholic meetings: "Away with these wolves in sheep's clothing from all Catholic houses, from all Catholic families, from all Catholic communities!" said Ernst Lieber in 1895. Authors such as Joseph Eberle, Viktor Kolb, later Felix Hardt, and a legion of pamphlets struggled against undermining tendencies. Especially typical of this phase of the "press apostles" are the books of Joseph Eberle (Grossmacht Presse[7]) and Giuseppe Chiaudano (Il Giornalismo Cattolico[8]). While Eberle chiefly denounced the general non-Catholic press, Chiaudano made clear all that the Catholic press must not do, but which north of the Alps it had long presumed to do, for example, in the discussion of dubia or the criticism of ecclesiastical decisions, in opposition to the Jesuit father's statements on the "necessità dello spirito di disciplina e di obbedienza." And the Code of Canon Law summarizes in Title XXIII the rules of censorship and prohibition, which, in consequence of a strict observance, had made almost impossible to Catholics a normal participation in the journalism of the time, active and passive. Where they took part in social communication as publishers, journalists, and readers, they could never entirely do this, if they were conscientious, without a bad conscience. The broken relationship of the Church to journalism had by no means been overcome when the age of the "new media" began.

---

[5] Cf. K. Nüssler, Geschichte des Katholischen Pressvereins (Diss. Munich 1954); R. Kohlbach, Kreuz und Feder (Graz 1933); K.M. Stepan, Stückwerk im Spiegel (Graz and Vienna 1949).

[6] W. B. Lerg, "Die Anfänge der Zeitung für alle," W. B. Lerg, M. Schmolke, eds., Massenpresse und Volkszeitung (Assen 1968), 1–46.

[7] J. Eberle, Grossmacht Presse. Enthüllungen für Zeitungsgläubige, Forderungen für Männer (Mergentheim 1910), 3d ed. (Regensburg and Vienna 1920).

[8] G. Chiaudano, Il giornalismo cattolico (Turin 1910).

Film and Radio in the Early Phase

Shortly before the turn of the century film presentations, at first as varieté attractions, and since 1920 the radio were ready for the use of the public. The early history of the Church's confrontation with these new media has as yet hardly been investigated. It can be taken as certain that at first it was not recognized as a publicity medium of general social and political relevance. Popular education and art were the spheres to which the cinema—the first term used for the movies—and the radio were assigned. With the catchword "educational functions" people noticed them quite early, at least in Central Europe, while in the United States, which quickly developed into the motherland of the great film industry, ecclesiastical attention was focused more strongly on the excesses of the content of the moving picture. For example, at the general assemblies of the Catholics of Germany there was criticism of the "poisoned abuses of the cinema," but at Aachen in 1912 in Kino-Reform-Anträgen there was adherence to the goal of the "positive reform work." Today it is almost forgotten that as early as 1910, in the framework of the Popular Association for Catholic Germany at Mönchen-Gladbach, there was founded the "Photographic Society with Limited Liability," which provided, loaned, or supplied together with the necessary equipment slide series and soon didactic films. A series of writings, Lichtbühnen-Bibliothek and the technical periodical Bild und Film (from 1912), supplemented the offering until the First World War ended these constructive efforts.[9] After the war the film work and the Catholic radio work, at first pursued by free initiative, settled in special workers' groups in the Central Educational Committee of the Catholic Associations of Germany (ZBA), founded in 1919.

Of course, both the ZBA and the Fulda Episcopal Conference at first hesitated when, after the official beginning of public radio broadcasting in Germany in October 1923, possibilities resulted for ecclesiastical collaboration in the organizing of broadcasting. The broadcasting of liturgical actions, a problem which has not been thoroughly discussed even today, caused anxiety, while access under the titles of art and popular education was less problematic.[10] More eagerness for risks was present in the movie: with its own production firms—Leo-Film of Munich in 1927, Eidophon of Berlin—a Catholic share in moving picture offerings could be financed. But the enterprise was a failure, and in 1933 Leo-Film dragged the Munich Leohaus, the chief office of the Catholic social associations, into bankruptcy. Film work as an educational function and increasingly as a function of a protecting pastoral theology was, however, able to consolidate itself. The American example of the Legion of Decency, founded in 1933, and its growing influence on American film production made a powerful impression. Also the collaboration in radio was permanently established. True, there was no success, as there was in the Netherlands, Spain, or Portugal, in setting up its own radio system or companies to produce programs. But the intensive cooperation, which was especially pushed by the radio prelate, Bernhard Marschall—"the Catholics have cooperated in radio from the start"[11]—assured the place for the Church's collaboration despite the control over radio quickly instituted by the Nazis.

---

[9] Cf. also E. Ritter, Die katholisch-soziale Bewegung Deutschlands im neunzehnten Jahrhundert und der Volksverein (Cologne 1954), 277. A survey of Catholic efforts in regard to the film after World War I are given in a "Kino-Nummer" of the Augustinus-Blatt 26(1922), no. 5/6. In preparation: H. Schmitt, Die kirchliche Filmarbeit in Deutschland von ihren Anfängen bis 1945 (Diss. Bonn).

[10] On this thematic area, G. Bauer, Kirchliche Rundfunkarbeit 1924–1939 (Frankfurt am Main 1966).

This first phase of the Church's concern with film and radio found a certain conclusion in the establishing of international organizations: In April 1928 the Office Catholique International du Cinéma (OCIC) was founded at The Hague, and also in 1928 there appeared, following the Cologne international press exhibition Pressa, the Bureau International de la Radiophonie Catholique—after World War II, UNDA. The first director of the bureau was Bernhard Marschall, just as earlier the Leo-Film director, Georg Ernst, had assumed the presidency of OCIC.[12] However, in the succeeding years the American model of the Legion of Decency acted as a standard, that is, the practice based on "moral codes," rather amounting to a censorship-like pastoral care of protection, established itself. It found the respect of the American film producers[13] and the approval of the Pope: Pius XI was moved by the work of the legion to issue the film encyclical Vigilanti cura in 1936:[14] for the future moral evaluation listings of films were to be issued in all countries and made known to the faithful.

---

[11] Report of the Essen Katholikentag 1932, 241.

[12] Contemporary source: G. Ernst and B. Marschall, eds., Film und Rundfunk. Zweiter Internationaler Katholischer Filmkongress, Erster Internationaler Katholischer Rundfunkkongress. Gesamtbericht (Munich 1929).

[13] A Jesuit, Father Daniel Lord, was requisitioned for the elaboration of a "Production Code" as a norm, also the "Hays Moral Code" of 1929–31, renewed in 1939 (V. Engelhardt, Kirche und Film [Düsseldorf 1958], 42ff.; U. Gregor, E. Patalas, Geschichte des Films [Munich 1973], 205f.).

[14] Cf. C. Ford, Le Cinéma au service de la foi (Paris 1953).

The Development of the Catholic Press in the International Survey

When there is mention of "Catholic press," there ordinarily result difficulties in defining it. These arise, on the one hand, from the fact that Catholic press does not have to be an unconditionally ecclesiastical press, and, on the other hand, from the question of the criteria by which a nonecclesiastical but still Catholic press should be determined to be Catholic. In our context "Catholic press" will then be understood if at least one of the following four features is encountered: (1) name, for example, in the title or subtitle: "Catholic Newspaper for . . ." "Diocesan Paper . . ."; (2) connection, with ecclesiastical officials and/or institutions, or Catholic associations, movements, parties; (3) active denominational adherence of the person or group of the editorial board or editor; and (4) clearly recognizable determination of the center of gravity of the content.[15]

The origin of a distinctively Catholic press seems to be promoted by definite social structures but impeded by others: Extreme diaspora situations permit Catholic periodicals to appear only marginally, as the examples of England or of the Scandinavian countries show; but even traditionally purely Catholic societies, wherever possible still with the state-Church character of the Catholic denomination, are not unconditionally favorable to the distinction, for example, Spain and Italy. This changes the moment when strong laicizing or anti-Church movements appear, for example, in France and recently in Poland. Also operating favorably are the existence of approximately equally strong and large denominational groups, the polarization in fashion-setting Christian or socialist-liberal political parties, or also the denominational underpinning of a pluralistic society; to this extent Germany, Austria, Switzerland, and the Netherlands are classic Catholic press countries, and even the United States has produced a varied Catholic press system. Growing prosperity and comprehensive, varied, and politically unhindered assistance with communications offerings seem to weaken the denominational press, as also the party press, whereas political communications pressure—control of the press, bringing the press into line—to the extent that it does not completely eliminate denominational publication, consolidates the remaining agencies. The conditions mentioned here have determined the history of the Catholic press in the twentieth century—naturally, different in the various social and political organizations. For the German-speaking countries of Europe and the Netherlands a similar development has resulted in this connection in so far as the Catholic press usually moves closer to the Catholic parties or supports these parties without its thereby becoming, apart from some exceptions, a strictly regulated party organ, as is the case, for example, with the Communist and Social Democratic Parties as well as the NSDAP. The party relationship developed before the First World War, whereas since the end of the Second World War a growing aloofness becomes discernible.

---

[15] M. Schmolke, Die schlechte Presse, 28f.

In Germany until 1933 Catholic press and Center press were de facto identified, despite numerous discussions of differences. Resulting from the Kulturkampf, this press reached the quantitative climax of its development shortly before the First World War. Statistics of the "St. Augustinusverein zur Pflege der katholischen Presse," founded in 1878, name 446 "Catholic newspapers" for 1912 and a total number of subscribers of 2.625 million.[16] The number of titles dropped, it is true, after the war, but not greatly—there were 434 in 1931—but of course concentration procedures had taken place, so that for a long time one could no longer speak of 434 independent newspapers; the circulation was then estimated at 2.5 million.[17] (There is no reliable and, as regards categories, uniform statistic of the Catholic press in Germany or elsewhere in the world.[18])

The general customary relation to the Center Party caused the Catholic daily press, after the Nazi seizure of power in 1933 or at the latest after the self-dissolution of the Center, to fall into the category of the "civic" press controlled by the Nazi press. This meant merely that it was not at once eliminated, as was the press of the KPD and SPD by means of the decree for the "Protection of People and State" of 28 February 1933. Goebbels' statement of 4 October 1933—"Absolutely no obstacle stands in the way of the multiformity of the public opinion press"[19]—did not assure the "civic" newspapers any sort of free room. The formerly Catholic among them were, even if at first direct prohibitions were rare, exposed to all the measures of conformity of the

---

[16] W. Kisky, ed., Der Augustinus-Verein zur Pflege der katholischen Presse von 1878 bis 1928 (Düsseldorf 1928), 227 and 229.

[17] H. Kapfinger, "Die Struktur der katholischen Presse," J. W. Naumann, ed., Die Presse und der Katholik (Augsburg 1932), 211–28.

[18] A survey is attempted by O. Groth, Die Zeitung II (Mannheim, Berlin, and Leipzig 1929), 436–38. Leads to the statistical sources may be found in M. Schmolke, Die schlechte Presse, pp. 395–416; among others, the following indications of literature: K. Bringmann, J. Frizenschaff 1888, M. Grünbeck, F. Hülskamp 1875, H. Keiter 1895 and 1913, W. Kisky, K. Löffler 1924; also the press statistics of L. Woerl, which are given in the bibliography in M. Schmolke, op. cit., 372, n. 147.

[19] "Rede des Reichsministers Dr. Goebbels vor der deutschen Presse bei Verkündung des Schriftleitergesetzes am 4. Oktober 1933," quoted from the copy in H. Schmidt-Leonhardt and P. Gast, Das Schriftleitergesetz vom 4. Oktober 1933, 3d ed. (Berlin 1944), 9–22, here 14.

Nazi press policy. In 1934–35 occurred the spectacular throttling of the Rhein-Mainische Volkszeitung, which in the last years of the Weimar Republic had, alongside Germania and the Kölnische Volkszeitung, acquired a supraregional stamp of a progressive Catholic type. Some papers, such as the Deutsches Volksblatt or the Badischer Beobachter of Karlsruhe, founded in 1848, found no way to escape the restrictions of an ever increasing number of new directives on press policy, and in 1935 they gave up.[20] Others, such as the Kölnische Volkszeitung, which in 1932 had just fallen into an economic crisis affecting its existence, or the Germania, were able to survive, but the Catholic legal line of the Germania (close to Hitler's first vice chancellor, Franz von Papen) did not always meet with the approval of its public: not suppressed literally but deserted by its own readers, it suspended publication on 31 December 1938.[21] The remaining, mostly smaller, daily press was exposed to various concentration procedures, which were for the most part assisted by Nazi measures. Their aim was to bring as many as possible of former Catholic papers into one of the Nazi collective publishing companies; in Catholic matters the Vera-Verlagsanstalt GmbH and the Phönix-GmbH were specialists. It was obligatory to sell to them if, for example, a publisher could no longer publish because of exclusion from the compulsory professional organization of the Reich press office.[22]

In the same Reich press office, on the other hand, the Catholic newspaper press, as a "professional organization Catholic Church press," could create for itself something almost like a reservation; until 1936 it was granted, among other things, by utilization of the idea, unclear in the concordat, of the "official diocesan papers," as the only kind of press brought under the protection of the 1933 concordat, relatively extensive and, after 1936, still some protection. Under political pressure, until 1936 the number of titles and the total circulation rose from 9.6 to 11.4 million between 1933 and 1936. Not until 1936 did those measures begin which, before the general shutting down of papers in 1941, caused almost three-fourths of the 416 titles of 1936 to disappear, but which also gained by force the kind of "diocesan paper" that thereafter determined the structure of the Catholic press in

---

[20] S. Kessemeier, Katholische Publizistik im NS-Staat 1933–1938 (Münster 1973), 18f.

[21] For the Kölnische Volkszeitung and Germania cf. the pertinent articles by R. Kramer and K. M. Stiegler in H. D. Fischer, ed., Deutsche Zeitungen des 17. bis 20. Jahrhunderts (Pullach 1972). The historiography of the Catholic press in the Third Reich has been recently supplemented by the dissertation of M. Hüsgen, Die Bistumsblätter in Niedersachsen während der nationalsozialistischen Zeit (Hildesheim 1975) and on the whole placed on a more solid basis.

[22] Cf. Kessemeier, op. cit., 20ff.

Germany and Austria: in each diocese there was now to be only one diocesan paper, to be decided and authorized by the bishop.[23]

The Second World War also meant a clear determining boundary line for the Catholic press in many other countries of Europe. For Germany and a little later for Austria it appeared earlier than for the Netherlands, Belgium, Poland, or France. In all these nations in the two decades of 1920–40 the Catholic press displayed a certain stability, although tending rather to concentration than to expansion. An overview, already in the shadow of the approaching catastrophe, was supplied by the "World Exposition of the Catholic Press," which was held at Vatican City from 12 May 1936 to 31 May 1937 with strong international participation—sixty-three exhibitors, mostly of countries or groups of countries from all the continents. The volume of reports[24] is not only one of the few comprehensive sources for the status of the Catholic press in the 1930s, it also makes known the European situation: Germany was represented by a total of two and one-half printed pages—France by thirty-four; from the information on Germany one learns a few historical titles, the circulation of Germania (7,500), but also data on the Völkischer Beobachter, the SA-Mann, and the Schulungsbrief, while Italy and Austria were tersely represented with lists of their still voluminous stocks, although the volume of reports did not appear until 1939.

In Austria the Christian Social Reichspost, founded in 1894, had as early as 1912 driven the conservative Catholic Vaterland (1860–1911) from the field. After the First World War it remained the leading Catholic voice, approving the corporate state, anti-Marxist, but also critical of the plans for Anschluss, whose forcible realization in 1938 meant the end of the paper, directed since 1902 by Friedrich Funder.[25] The Catholic press of the Austrian lands was supported by the "Catholic Press Associations," founded everywhere toward the end of the nineteenth century. Their tradition proved to be so strong even after the end of the Second World War that the publishing enterprises proceeding from them, mostly medium-sized, could provide the foundation of the new diocesan papers as well as of those newspapers which were Christian-oriented and supported the Austrian People's Party.

---

[23] For statistics cf. K. A. Altmeyer, Katholische Presse unter NS-Diktatur (Berlin 1962), 79 and 94–98. On the actual situation as regards the "diocesan papers"—one or several per diocese?—cf. M. Hüsgen, op. cit., 120–23.

[24] Istituto Cattolico per la Stampa, ed., La Stampa Cattolica nel Mondo (Milan 1939).

[25] F. Funder, Vom Gestern ins Heute (Vienna 1952); cf. also R. Barta, "Katholische Pressearbeit in Österreich," K. Richter, ed., Katholische Presse in Europa (Osnabrück 1969), 43–62.

In Vienna there was after 1945 no recourse to the tradition of the Catholic daily of the Reichspost; the weekly Die Furche understood itself as the agent of tradition. In addition to the Innsbruck Volksboten (since 1973 Präsent), it represents the type of weekly newspaper for the intellectual Catholic reading public. The leading cultural newspaper, Wort und Wahrheit, founded in 1946, was discontinued in 1973.

The Catholic press in Switzerland goes back, with some important organs, to the same period when in Germany the Kulturkampf brought about the rise of Catholic papers: La Liberté of Fribourg and Vaterland of Lucerne were founded in 1871, the Basler Volksblatt in 1872, and the Ostschweiz of Sankt Gallen in 1874. "The Catholic population seems to have felt the need for their own local papers, with which they could identify politically and religiously, as with the associations, which indeed contributed essentially to the defining of their identity in Swiss society."[26] The most recently founded, the Neue Zürcher Nachrichten (1896 as an association paper, 1904 as a daily), developed not only in competition with the Neue Zürcher Zeitung but became the best known Catholic paper of a large Swiss city, while the Vaterland, as the "conservative central organ for German Switzerland," still functions not only to form opinion but also to effect economic stability. For the Swiss press also attempts to assure its existence by concentration measures, which have recently led to intensive cooperation with the calming poles Vaterland and Ostschweiz and have brought about some changes in the news press.

The activity of the English Catholics found journalistic expression in the founding of only a few important newspapers: The Tablet (1840), The Universe (1860), The Catholic Herald (1884), and The Month, founded by Jesuits in 1864, look back to noteworthy traditions. France, on the other hand, now as earlier is counted among the important countries for the Catholic press. The publicity activities of the nineteenth century, rich in number and in conflict, found a concluding climax in the establishing of the Maison de la Bonne Presse by the Assumptionists, especially Vincent de Paul Bailly. That Catholic publicity center in the Rue Bayard at Paris, which adopted the "good press" as a program into the title of the firm, proceeded from the founding of two periodicals, which were then for decades essential voices of the Catholic publicity of France: in 1872–73 Bailly began with Le Pèlerin, founded originally as a monthly organ of the Conseil Généréal des Pèlerinages, but in 1877 transformed into a popular illustrated periodical, which a little later had a circulation of over 100,000. In 1880 a monthly periodical, La Croix, was added; in 1883, changed into a daily paper, La Croix developed into the "Quotidien catholique par excellence."[27] In its founding period comparable to the Germania or the Lucerne Vaterland, La Croix nevertheless proved to be also a quantitatively successful newspaper; popular in its first decades, it still surpassed the 100,000 circulation in the decade of its founding, reached 185,000 even before the First World War (1912), and is said to have had its record year in 1937 with a circulation (unverified) of 300,000. These are numbers which remained out of reach of the Catholic daily in Germany. In the Second World War La Croix first withdrew to Bordeaux, then to Limoges. There on 21 June 1944 it interrupted its publication for the first time, and after the liberation of France it had to endure a process of gaining permission again, which spoiled the starting conditions. The postwar circulation was around 100,000 and did not increase again until the annexation in 1959 of La Croix du Nord of Lille, founded in 1889. The Second Vatican Council caused interest to grow again, and the circulation reached about 140,000, but the gains of the paper, which in accord with its own self-awareness aimed to correspond to the standards of a journal d'opinion as well as of a journal d'information, could not be maintained. La Croix du Nord was in 1968 reduced to a weekly. The Catholic daily press of France shrank between 1958 and 1964 from nine to four independent papers, among which only La Croix was of importance, but the periodical press lived on the rich diversity to which it had developed in the nineteenth century and the first third of the twentieth century. In the mid-1960s it was believed that, after the disappearance of the parish papers, one could still speak of about one thousand titles.[28] Besides the Bonne Presse, the most important publishers are the Union des Oeuvres Catholiques de France, founded in 1871, and, since 1945, the publisher of the illustrated La Vie [Catholique Illustrée], which, alongside Le Pèlerin [du 20e Siècle], reached a half-million in the mid-1960s. The Sunday press is powerfully represented in the chain of the various Croix-Dimanche editions (in 1964 in fifteen départements), begun in 1889 under the title of La Croix du Dimanche, the political appendix to the Pèlerin. The Catholic publishers of France early devoted special attention to the children's and youth press. Some titles, like Nade (1914) or Reccord (precursor of L'Echo du Noël, 1906) go back to the time before the First World War. A fairly large number of titles long persisted with rather small circulations. The supraregional weekly press with intellectual pretensions exhibited for a long time a wing-formation, like comparable media in Germany: La France Catholique, founded in 1925, was classified as conservative, Témoinage-Chrétien, founded in 1941, as progressive; both circulations dropped to about 50,000 by 1968.

---

[26] F. P. Schaller, Notstand im christlichen Pressewesen (Einsiedeln and Zurich 1974), 154f. For the situation in Switzerland cf. also. C. Holenstein, "Katholische Presse in der Schweiz," in K. Richter, op. cit., 63–70; also E. Fehr, "Schweiz: Katholische Presse in der Krise," CS 8(1975), 150–52.

---

[27] J. and P. Godfrin, Une Centrale de la Presse Catholique, La Maison de la Bonne Presse et ses Publications (Paris 1965), 134.

[28] C. Ehlinger, "Katholische Presse in Frankreich," in K. Richter, op. cit., 95–115; cf. also G. Hourdin, La Presse Catholique (Paris 1957).

The development of the Catholic press of France took place on the whole independently of the official Church. The "in structural view . . . independent Catholic press," to quote Ehlinger, was united in two associations in 1951 and 1952, the Association Nationale des Périodiques Catholiques de Provence (ANPCP) and the Centre National Catholique de Presse (CNPC). "The registration of a periodical or newspaper in one of these associations amounted to a clear indication of the membership of these publications in the Catholic press."[29]

In Spain "it would not be false to maintain that all daily newspapers which . . . appear today regard themselves as in some sense Catholic. However, not all rightly deserve this designation."[30] The problem of the Catholic press after the end of the civil war was to so adapt itself under a government that was officially friendly to the Church in a nonliberal democratic system that a specifically Catholic profile could again be discernible. The press law of 22 April 1938 left little latitude for this, and the new, more generous press law of 18 May 1966 was altered by restrictions in 1968. A Catholic profile was sought in three ways: (1) as regards the daily press, through collaboration in groups, of which the Editorial Católica and the newspaper chain of Opus Dei could each be found, in second or third place behind the Cadena del Movimiento (In the Editorial Católica there appeared with Ya of Madrid, founded in 1935 and having a circulation of 140,000 in 1968, one of the three great dailies of the country.); (2) as regards the periodicals, through a more or less clear attitude of opposition, which, as in the case of Signo in 1967, could run the risk of their existence; (3) in the training of journalists, to which special attention was paid by the Catholic side. Internationally noteworthy and in Spain not only recognized by the state but meanwhile standard-setting, is the journalism curriculum founded as the institute for journalism in 1958 on the [29] Ehlinger, op. cit., 111.

---

[30] A. Montero, "Kirche, Katholiken und Presse in Spanien," in K. Richter, op. cit., 116–42, here 122.

Facultad de Ciencias de la Información of the Opus Dei University of Navarre at Pamplona.[31]

The growth of the Catholic press of Italy was determined into the twentieth century by the conflict between the Italian state and the Papal state. For decades the nationally minded press could be sure to conform to the official view. The Catholic press of the entirely Catholic country was, on the other hand, from the beginning politically in a defensive posture. L'Osservatore Romano began to appear on 1 July 1861 as "giornale politico-morale"; while it was under the control and encouragement of the Interior Ministry of the Papal State (but in the beginning, outside of it) and appeared, together with the official Giornale di Roma of 1849–70, as a quasi-private political newspaper, the expression used by Montini did not yet apply to it: "Non per nulla, come si dice, è 'il giornale del Papa.'" The purpose of the new paper was defense: "'to unmask calumnies' and, as was later added, 'to refute what was hurled against Rome and the Roman papacy.'"[32] In the period between 1870 and 1929 L'Osservatore Romano appeared as a political daily, alongside other Roman newspapers, but in a special development, as is said in a contribution of the first number of 4–5 November 1929, indicating as place of publication the Città del Vaticano: "Under the Pontificate of Leo XIII the L'Osservatore Romano ever more assumed the character of an organ of the Holy See. . . ."[33]

The succeeding fifteen years saw L'Osservatore Romano, like the rest of Italy's Catholic press, in a difficult position. However, there were direct encroachments only after Italy's entry into the Second World War. Besides occasional prohibitions of its sale in Italy—"now [at the beginning of 1940] the Catholic paper of Vatican City has too many readers, who must be carefully supervised!"[34]—on 13 June 1940 was suppressed L'Osservatore Romano's custom of printing the armed-forces reports of the warring powers. Still, the circulation in the war years is said to have risen to more than 300,000 copies.

After the Second World War L'Osservatore Romano so developed "officially, as regards the announcements coming from the Vatican and semiofficially as regards the rest,"[35] that it evoked conflicting evaluations: on the one hand, for example, addressed by The Times as belonging to the "world press,"[36] on the other hand, it was criticized even by Catholic journalists because of the various dependencies of its editorship and its hardly justified journalistic work. In view of the poor working conditions, however, the intentional international expansion was noteworthy, despite the modest circulation, about 70,000, of the branch editions. In addition to the illustrated sister paper, L'Osservatore della Domenica, a weekly since 1934, in 1951 a Latin American weekly edition came into existence in Buenos Aires. Since 1948 there has been an Italian weekly edition, since 1949 a French, since 1968 an English, since 1969 a Spanish, since 1970 a Portuguese, and since 1971 the "Weekly Edition in German."[37]

---

[31] Cf. J. Liminski, "Journalistenausbildung an der katholischen Universität von Navarra in Pamplona," CS 8(1975), 153–64.

[32] D. Hansche, "Zur Geschichte des L'Osservatore Romano, CS 3(1970), 13–23 and 99–109, here 13f.—in Hansche also the pertinent literature on the history of L'Osservatore Romano.

[33] Cf. Hansche, op. cit., 100.

[34] Quoted ibid., 101.

[35] I. Weiss, Il potere di carta. Il giornalismo ieri ed oggi (Turin 1965), 107, quoted from Hansche, op. cit., 103.

For the rest, the Catholic press of Italy, like that in other countries of Western Europe, was subject to increasing concentration pressure after the Second World War.[38] Of its not very numerous daily newspapers[39] L'Avvenire d'Italia of Bologna, founded in 1896 and rich in tradition, had to combine, for economic reasons but also for the sake of a progressive outlook, with L'Italia of Milan, founded in 1912; their new title is Avvenire. At first hardly noticed on the outside, from 1931 a Catholic recreational periodical in Italy developed into presumably the Catholic periodical with the highest circulation in the world, the Famiglia Cristiana. Founder, owner, and publisher is the religious community Pia Società San Paolo, internationally active in the sphere of Catholic publicity. Through a skillfully organized sales system in parishes it caused the former Sunday sheet to grow into a modern family illustrated journal, which printed its jubilee edition for its fortieth year of existence in an issue of 2 million.[40] In comparison to this, the diocesan weekly press, despite the large number of more than one hundred titles, is underdeveloped. Within the Unione Cattolica Stampa Italiana (UCSI), it has combined in a special group, the Federazione Italiana Settimanali Cattolici (FISC).

Dissolution of Catholic journalistic unions seems, on the other hand, to mark a decisive turn in that country which can be described as the sociologically and sociohistorically most productive field of historical investigation of the Catholic press: the Netherlands. The union Katholieke Nederlandse Dagbladpers and the Katholieke Nederlandse Journalisten-Kring, both reestablished at the wish of the episcopate in 1945 and 1946 respectively, suspended their activity in 1968–69. Catholic journalists and also their public were bored, at the latest since the Second Vatican Council, with "columnization" (verzuiling) as the special form for expressing pluralism in the Netherlands.[41] Of the continually relatively strong Catholic daily press since the apologetically struggling nineteenth century—in 1937 there were thirty-two Catholic daily newspapers out of a total of seventy-nine—that paper proved to be the most vital which displayed itself after the Second World War as a journal d'information with a political Catholic policy of socially oriented progressivism without especially hiding its Catholicity: De Volkskrant of Amsterdam could raise its circulation from 150,000 in 1947 to 206,000 in 1974, and also a Catholic-oriented local press acquired a considerable share of circulation. On the other hand, other organs, which had marked the "column" or "pillar" Dutch Catholicism of the 1920s and 1930s, such as De Maasbode (1868–1959) or Het Centrum (1884–1960), merged or entirely disappeared, and the traditional agent of the Catholic press, De Tijd (1845–1974), pined away to an end after the Second World War, even as it had consciously made a decision for the function of a forum between the Catholic fronts.[42] All together, the share of at least the Netherlands press that followed Catholic traditions remained quite high. Something similar is true also for neighboring Belgium, whose Catholics achieved a stable political and journalistic position still earlier. The split into a conservative and a Christian-Democratic faction shortly before the turn of the century resembles Austrian precedents. Among the great papers of Belgium Catholic titles in French—La Libre Belgique since 1883—as well as in Flemish—De Standaard since 1914—were able to maintain good positions—in 1968 their respective circulations were 170,000 and 290,000.[43] Unique, at best only comparable to L'Osservatore Romano, is the role played by the Luxemburger Wort in the little Benelux nation: the largest newspaper of the country with an uninterrupted tradition since 1848 and a stable circulation of 73,000.[44]

---

[36] Cf. H. D. Fischer, Die grossen Zeitungen (Munich 1966), 294.

[37] E. Bordfeld, "Der Osservatore Romano—Wochenausgabe in deutschen Sprache," CS 7(1974), 155–59; also G. Deussen, "Der deutschsprachige Osservatore Romano—überflüssig?" CS 5(1972), 343–45.

[38] Cf. D. Hansche, "Krise und Ende des L'Avvenire d'Italia, CS 3(1970), 348–51.

[39] Cf. the Annuario 1970 of the Unione Cattolica Stampa Italiana (UCSI) (Rome 1970), P. VI: "La stampa cattolica in Italia," 491–556. The most recent information on the Catholic press of Italy is given by the announcement no. 2094 in the KNA-Informationsdienst, no. 40/1976, of 30 September 1976, p. 4: "Italiens Kirchenpresse: eine aufschlussreiche Statistik."

[40] E. Bordfeld, "40 Jahre Famiglia Cristiana," CS 4(1971), 126–28.

---

[41] G. W. Marsman, De Katholieke Dagbladpers in sociologisch perspectief (Assen 1967); idem, "Katholische Presse in den Niederlanden," in K. Richter, op. cit., 71–81.

[42] J. Hemels, "Katholische Presse in den Niederlanden," CS 8(1975), Pt. I: pp. 1–22; Teil II: pp. 123–46. For Scandinavia cf. J. Berg, "Skandinavien: Die katholische Presse," UCIP Informations no. 4 (Geneva 1976), 8f.

[43] L. Boone, "Situation und Zukunftstendenzen der katholischen Presse in Belgien," in K. Richter, op. cit., 95–115.

Hence while in most countries of Europe worthy of mention in connection with the Catholic press Catholic duties were able to continue to a certain degree beyond the Second World War, this turning-point meant, cum grano salis, for Germany and those nations which were thereafter reckoned as socialist, including Catholic Poland, the end of the Catholic daily press. The licensing policy of the Allied occupying powers and the founding of the Christian-Democratic Union that intentionally went beyond denominations prevented the reestablishing or establishing of dailies.[45] Only one newspaper was authorized as a bearer of the tradition of the Weimar period, Johann Wilhelm Naumann's Augsburger Tagespost on 28 August 1948, from which emerged the supraregional Deutsche Tagespost of a strictly conservative Catholic outlook but weak in circulation—less than 30,000. When, after the abolition of the compulsory licensing in September 1949, the "Old Publishers" tried to reestablish the traditional titles or their continuations, some Catholic publishing companies also took part. However, most of these foundations again disappeared from the market, among them the Deutsches Volksblatt, founded at Stuttgart in 1848, interrupted under the Nazis, then resumed until 1965, the Badische Volkszeitung of Karlsruhe, discontinued also in 1969, and the Trierer Landeszeitung/Saarbrücker Landeszeitung, suspended in 1972.

Quickly and stably twenty-two diocesan newspapers were reestablished and in part newly founded in the Western Zone and two—St. Hedwigsblatt in East Berlin and Tag des Herrn in Leipzig—in the Soviet Zone. Besides them there appeared in the West a richly developed press for associations, youth, and religious institutes. (In 1949 publishers and editors united in the Arbeitsgemeinschaft Katholische Presse e. V. [previously Arbeitsgemeinschaft Kirchliche Press; AKP], and Catholic publicists of all the media in 1948 in the Gesellschaft katholischer Publizisten Deutschlands). Recreational periodicals could develop only modestly; cultural periodicals suffered, except for the Stimmen der Zeit, from deconfessionalization (Werkhefte, Frankfurter Hefte, [Neues] Hochland); finally political weeklies confronted a quantitatively not adequate target group and could not go beyond the circulation minimum that assured existence. Even the circulation, stable for years and oscillating from 50,000 to 60,000, of the [44] J. Gelamur, "Luxemburger Wort," Journalistes Catholiques 21 (Geneva 1973), special double number, 33–35.

---

[45] Cf. also M. Schmolke, Die schlechte Presse, 268.

Rheinischer Merkur of Cologne and Koblenz, founded in 1946, regarded as Catholic and close to the Christian Democratic Union but politically and as a publishing enterprise independent, could not, in view of increasing production costs, retain its economic independence; in 1974 the paper passed into ecclesiastical majority ownership. The politically ambitious but not successful Echo der Zeit of Recklinghausen, proceeding in 1952 from the Cologne Katholischer Beobachter, was suspended in 1968 in favor of the promising experiment which the Catholic Church in the German Federal Republic had assumed after the Second World War: in 1968 after almost three years of preparatory work the weekly Publik of Frankfurt am Main was founded. According to its differently elaborated program, it was supposed to be the leading voice of German Catholicism and at the same time the forum for the expression of diametrically opposed opinions in the postconciliar period. Because with this idea no sufficiently large and stable body of subscribers could be acquired, Publik was ended in the autumn of 1971 after it had cost a total of at least 30 million German marks.[46] At that time the Catholic press had long left behind the climax of its postwar development—in 1963 there was talk, without a reliable basis, of 400 titles and a total subscription of 16 million. The twenty-two diocesan papers—in 1963 they had a total circulation of 2.45 million—had lost, apart from some exceptions, portions of their readership year by year—in 1974 they had less than 2 million readers.[47] The Catholic youth press died out.[48] While the first postconciliar phase in Germany generally gave the impression of an intellectually strengthened Church, the decline of the publicity potential began to cause anxiety.[49]

---

[46] M. Schmolke, ed., "Publik"—Episode oder Lehrstück? (Paderborn 1974). On the economic aspect of publishing see U. Nussberger, "Publik als Testfall verlagswirtschaftlicher Planung," CS 9(1976), 126–42.

[47] F. Oertel, Dialogform Kirchenpresse (Limburg 1972).

[48] J. Hoeren, Die katholische Jugendpresse 1945–1970 (Munich 1974) Deutsches Institut für wissenschaftliche Pädagogik, D.I.P.—Information no. 8. On the development of the Catholic youth press in Austria, see H. Pürer, "Kirchliche Jugendpublizistik in Österreich," CS 7(1974), 137–52.

[49] A similar negative trend is apparent in the Catholic press of the United States and Canada, whose history has not been investigated well enough to permit a comprehensive comparison with the European viewpoint. The completely multisided, to a great extent diocesan-oriented periodical system represents altogether the largest circulation block with the world's Catholic press. However, it declined from 27.7 million in 1968 to 22.7 million in 1973. Among the more than 400 titles are ca. 120 diocesan papers. The Jesuit periodical America of New York, founded in 1909, must be the best known paper, nationally and internationally. The association of Catholic journalism in the Information about the Catholic Press in the German Democratic Republic and in the neighboring states to the east moves scantily in the entire postwar period. In the German Democratic Republic persons are restricted to the two ecclesiastical papers mentioned above and the nonperiodic publications of the Leipzig St.-Benno-Verlag. The Czechoslovak paper, Katolicke Noviny, appearing in a Czech and a Slovak edition, was always regarded as close to the priests' movement, "Pacem in terris," that was friendly to the government, while in Poland the weekly Tygodnik Powszechny of Cracow, founded in 1945, in the framework of the Znak group, and with it some diocesan papers as well as the Warsaw monthly Więź, were able to maintain relative independence, competing with the Pax group and its organ, Slowo Powszechne. In Socialist Yugoslavia the periodical Glas Concila, founded in 1962 in connection with the Second Vatican Council, established itself unexpectedly rapidly; but the circulation, rising to 180,000, produced an especially attentive political supervision, which had numerous prohibitions and confiscations as its consequence.

Catholic News Agencies

A need to provide the Catholic press with special information material, by means of press or news agencies, was understood before the turn of the century. From this there occurred in Germany the founding in 1879 of the Centrums-Parlaments-Correspondenz (CPC) to serve Catholic political ends, an initiative not of the Center Party but of the Augustinusverein zur Pflege der katholischen Presse. It and its succeeding institutions—CPC-GmbH, ZPK-GmbH—supplied Catholic newspapers more poorly than correctly with information from the parliamentary activities of the Center—down to the dissolution of the ZPK in 1922.[50] Catholic press agencies in the strict sense only appeared in the First World War: in 1917 at Fribourg in Switzerland the KIPA (Catholic International Press Agency); the American National Catholic News Service of Washington also goes back to 1917. It grew out of the press department of the National Catholic War Council, founded in 1917, and later renamed the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and today the United States Catholic Conference.[51] The third, for Catholic

---

United States, the Catholic Press Association (CPA), cooperates internationally with the German AKP. References to the crisis in P. Jordan, "NC News Service in der Krise der katholischen USA-Presse," CS 3(1970), 257–62.

[50] M. Bornefeld-Ettmann, "Die Centrums-Parlaments-Correspondenz (CPC)," CS 1(1968), 318–25.

[51] P. Jordan, op. cit., CS 3(1970), 257–62.

concerns, "great" agency is the KNA (Catholic News Agency of Bonn and Munich),[52] emerging in 1952 from its precursors, the KND and CND. Besides its current service, it has developed a whole division of special services, has at its disposal a European and overseas net of correspondents, and was one of the driving forces in the collaboration of Catholic news agencies beginning at Rome with the Second Vatican Council: in 1971 it found a definite form in an international union of Catholic news agencies, in which KNA, KIPA, Kathpress of Austria, CIP of Belgium, and KNP of the Netherlands[53] maintain joint editorship under the designation CIC (Centrum Informationis Catholicum). For a long time there was regarded as a really semiofficial Roman agency the International Fides Service,[54] founded in 1927 in connection with the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, which, however, declined ever more in importance when, since the Second Vatican Council, the Vatican's press work was concentrated in the Sala Stampa and intensified.

In 1936 there were Catholic agencies or similar institutions in sixteen countries, in 1971 in twenty-one.[55] Of course, their efficacy is not unquestioned in relation to the expense—cf. the case of KNP—and especially in countries of the Third World—for example, DIA, Zaire; CNI, India—their existence is jeopardized.

Radio and Television under the Restrictions of Commercial or of Public Control

Since the radio became a public medium in 1922, three forms of organization have developed: radio as a state industry, radio as a public law institution, and radio as a private economic undertaking, which sells its broadcast time partly to a third party and from the net proceeds draws not only subsistence but a profit. The first two types are predominantly based on financing by the fees of participants and are characterized by the mark of public control, in part directly by the state, in part by special social control bodies, for example, in Germany the Rundfunkräte, in Austria the Kuratorium of the ORF.

In accord with the respective "radio constitution" of each nation the [52] Katholische Nachrichten-Agentur, ed., De instrumentis informationis, 2d ed. (Bonn 1972).

---

[53] The KNP had to suspend activity in 1973 (cf. E. Oudejans, "Geschichte und Ende des 'Katholiek Nederlands Persbureau' [KNP]," CS 6[1973], 144–51).

[54] J.J. Considine, "Die Gründung des internationalen Fides-Dienstes," CS 5(1972), 53–56.

[55] For 1936: "La Stampa Cattolica nel Mondo," op. cit., 36. For 1971: Journalistes Catholiques 19(Paris 1971), no. 56/57, p. 9.

Church has various favorable opportunities of participating in or at least of influencing radio and television. Only state radio systems in countries fundamentally hostile to the Church completely exclude its cooperation.

To give a comparative international description of the entire development is impossible because of lack of space. In general it can be said that the Church makes use of all types of possibilities available, but often has by no means exhausted them. The private economic pattern provides two opportunities in those countries where it is followed, hence especially in the United States and in the countries of Latin America and Asia that are influenced by the United States: a) the sale of broadcast time for church broadcasting, practiced, for example, in the United States and Japan, and b) the establishing of private broadcasting facilities, for the countries here mentioned are rather liberal in the granting of radio concessions. The second method was followed successfully especially by international Protestant agencies. Thus arose, among others, the Voice of the Andes at Quito as early as 1931; the Radio Voice of the Gospel of Addis Ababa, in 1963; the Far East Broadcasting Company, founded in 1945 with headquarters in Whittier, California, and principal Asian headquarters since 1948 at Manila; and Trans World Radio of Monte Carlo, founded in 1954 as Voice of Tangiers, which since 1959, as Radio of the Gospel, supports a German branch at Wetzlar.[56] Comparable on the Catholic side would be the enterprise Radio Veritas, established with German aid at Manila/Quezon City, which started its operation in 1968 and had to struggle with many difficulties presented by the state, and the Federation of Catholic Broadcasters, also active in the Philippines, with headquarters at Manila. In countries with public law or similar broadcasting systems, the Church shares in the social control of broadcasting institutions, for example, through radio councils, in the framework of the legal possibilities on the one hand, while on the other hand, it employs the possibilities of forming its own preaching broadcasts, for example, conveying the Mass, and of cooperating in the broadcasting of sections appropriate for Church and religion, by constituting them or advising. These distributions of competition are clearly marked, especially in the German Federal Republic, where in the first year after the Second [56] K. H. Hochwald, "Trans World Radio und Evangeliums-Rundfunk," CS 2(1969), 56–58; C. Jahn, Frequenzen der guten Nachricht. Rundfunksender "Stimme des Evangeliums" Addis Abeba (Erlangen 1973); G. H. Ledyard, Sky Waves. The Incredible Far East Broadcasting Company (Chicago 1963). Summary: J. Schmidt, Massenmedien als Instrumente der Mission. Missionsrundfunk als Beispiel (Diss. Heidelberg 1974). New is the attempt for a Catholic diocesan television in Chicago; cf. F. J. Eilers, "ctn-Diözesan-Fernsehen in Chicago," CS 9(1976), 39–41.

---

World War the project of a special Christian "Bamberg Broadcast" failed,[57] and in Austria. In the course of the ideological "columnization," the broadcast system of the Netherlands developed fully. While the Nederlandse Omroep Stichting is the sponsor of the entire broadcasting system, the program is produced by several, mostly ideologically oriented operating enterprises, the position of which depends on the number of participants acknowledging them. Since 1925 the Katholieke Radio Omroep (KRO, Hilversum) handles the Catholic role.[58] While foreign observers not rarely regard the Dutch system as the ideal realization of pluralistic broadcasting work, there are in the Netherlands also many critical voices.

In 1931 the Vatican established its own radio station under the name Radio Vatican; at first its broadcasting techniques operated with very modest means. Since the construction in 1952–57 of Santa Maria in Galeria on a tract outside Vatican City, twenty-five kilometers north of Rome, Radio Vatican beams broadcasts on medium wave, shortwave, and ultra shortwave to the whole world in some thirty languages.[59]

Church Journalism in the Third World

In many countries of the Third World the ecclesiastical journalism of the present is based on foundations laid in the colonial period by missionary work. In this regard, two different centers of gravity can be determined: In some countries of Asia, but especially in Africa, it began early with Christian press work; in Latin America, on the contrary, there developed from modest beginnings a fruitful field of Catholic radio work, especially in the area of educational radio. Catholic "radio schools" and comparable institutions or program offerings appeared after the Second World War in, among other places, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Colombia, and Peru. Catholic broadcasters were, in this connection, not oriented only to the aim of teaching, but especially developed systems of social communication that served the rural population, to move up in these occasionally newspaperlike information sheets to radio programs and school courses, as in the internationally well known radio school project, Radio Sutatenza in Colombia, the weekly newspaper El Campesino with a circulation of 70,000. The enterprise supported since 1949 by the

---

[57] Cf. M. Schmolke, Die schlechte Presse, 272f.

[58] J. Hemels, "Der katholische Rundfunk im niederländischen Rundfunksystem," CS 8(1975), 213–29.

[59] E. Schmitz, "Sender des Friedens," K. Becker, K. A. Siegel eds., Rundfunk und Fernsehen im Blick der Kirche (Frankfurt 1957), 32–40; A. Kochs, "Radio Vatikan," Funk-Korrespondenz 23(1975), no. 4, pp. 1–4, and no. 5, pp. 5–8.

Acción Cultural Popular (ACPO), founded in 1947 by the chaplain José Joaquín Salcedo, was able to lower considerably the number of Colombia's illiterates and make important contributions to village development.[60]

In general church journalism in the Third World in the decade after 1960 came ever more under the idea of the promotion of development.[61] This is a new emphasis in contrast to the missionary and pastoral motivation which for decades long determined Catholic press activity in many African and some Asiatic countries, such as India. The more African states became independent, the more frequently Catholic newspapers and periodicals fell into difficult situations: On the one hand, they were the politically less burdened representatives of a journalistic expertise which was lacking in many of the young states, on the other hand they came into conflict with politically prejudiced systems but also into economic difficulties, which caused the Union Catholique Internationale de la Presse to ask anxiously: "La presse catholique d'Afrique est-elle condamnée?"[62] Many Catholic papers, rich in tradition—including the Catholic daily Munno, founded at Kampala, Uganda, in 1911 but forbidden in 1976; the weekly Afrique Chrétienne of Kinshasa, Zaire (1961); Afrique Nouvelle of Dakar, Senegal, founded in 1947, suspended in 1972, revived in 1974, forbidden in 1976; L'Effort Camerounais of Yaoundé, Cameroon (1955); La Croix du Dahomey of Cotonou, Dahomey (1946); or The Standard of Cape Coast, Ghana (1939), with persistent difficulties—had to stop publication for a time or permanently; others, such as Kiongozi of Dar es Salaam, Tanzania (1950), remained alive. Political prohibitions or hindrances came from totally different directions: in Zaire the entire Catholic press was suspended in 1973, in "white" Rhodesia the critical attention of the government was concentrated on the products of the Catholic publisher, Mambo Press (Gwelo).

Despite manifold dangers and economic straits there exists in Africa and Asia a Catholic press of modest dimensions but of astonishing diversity.[63] In this regard the founders and editors, mostly members of missionary orders or companies, attempted early to publish in the national vernaculars. This is true also of the journalistic opening up of very remote areas, for example, Oceania, and obviously in general for broadcasting work in all missionary lands.[64]

---

[60] S. A. Musto, Massenmedien als Instrumente der ländlichen Entwicklungsförderung (Berlin 1969).

[61] Cf. the bibliography, "Church and Communication in Developing Countries," compiled by W. Herzog (Paderborn 1973), and the Sodepax-Konferenz-Bericht, "Church, Communication, Development" (Geneva, n.d. [1971]).

[62] Africa issues no. 62/63 and no. 64/65 of the periodical Journalistes Catholiques (Paris 1972).

[63] Cf. F. J. Eilers and W. Herzog, Catholic Press Directory Africa/Asia (Paderborn 1975); F. J. Eilers, Christliche Publizistik in Afrika (St. Augustin 1964); C.H.M. Verhaak, Aspecten van de pers in Oost-Afrika (Grave 1974); J. Hosse "Die katholische Presse im

To promote an understanding of the problems of the missions and today of the underdeveloped countries—such is the goal set for itself by the quite strongly developed mission press[65] in the United States and many countries of Europe. Its beginnings, marked in Germany by the founding of the periodical Die katholischen Missionen in 1873, extend back into the nineteenth century. For a long time the popular periodicals were welcome reading material as recompense for sacrifice for the sake of the mission. The changed relationship to the Third World—aid for development, encouraging of structure, the new auxiliary works Misereor, Adveniat, and so forth—caused interest to go back to the classical mission journalism; the circulations of many papers declined, and there appeared, proceeding from the first freely initiated concentration procedures in the Catholic press market, a new type of mission magazine, which was at times published in common by several religious communities active in the mission: in Germany Kontinente, since 1966, at first twelve, later twenty-five representatives; in the Netherlands Bijeen (1968), with seventeen representatives; in Spain Tercer Mundo (1970), with six representatives; in France, less successful, Peuples du Monde (1965).[66] In addition, a few individual titles, some of them of strong circulation, could continue, whose steadfastness rests on the combination of family entertainment and mission aims.

Church and Mass Communication in Theory and Organization

The rather negative relation of the Church to the journalistic media since the Reformation evoked as early as the nineteenth but especially in the twentieth century a large number of papal and episcopal französischsprachigen West- und Zentralafrika," CS 5(1972), 156–62; T. Luiz, Indian Catholic Press (Bombay 1971); J. Barret, "Katholische Presse in Indien," CS 1(1968), 43–45.

---

[64] F. J. Eilers, Zur Rolle der Publizistik in der Missionsarbeit des Fernen Ostens und Ozeaniens (Münster, 1965); idem, "Presse und Funk im Territorium von Papua und Neuguinea," CS 1(1968), 197–208, 295–307.

[65] L. Janek, "Katholische Missionszeitschriften in den USA," CS 4(1971), 226–32; J. Simmers, "Missionspublizistik in den Niederlanden," CS 1(1968), 40–43; M. Eigenmann and F. H. Fleck, "Schweizer Missionsjournalistik," CS 3(1970), 339–43; F. J. Eilers, "Arnold Janssen als Publizist. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der deutschsprachigen Missionspublizistik," CS 8(1975), 301–23.

[66] J. Hosse, "Missionspresse im Wandel der Zeit," CS 5(1972), 348–51.

decisions, whose basic tone was condemning to rejecting, only occasionally encouraging the "good" (Catholic) press. Meanwhile, they fill their own professionally specialized source collections.[67] A change began with the first really mass-media encyclical, the film encyclical Vigilanti cura of Pius XI in 1936.[68] As regards content, this encyclical introduced binding control institutions: On the model of the American Legion of Decency there arose in many countries Catholic offices for evaluating films, as after the Second World War in Germany, Austria, and Switzerland Catholic film commissions, whose activity was very beneficent in their informative ingredient but meanwhile was out-of-date in their aim of moral guidance.[69] The pacemaker function of Vigilanti cura was the fact that there was now a media encyclical at all. It was followed in 1957 by Miranda prorsus, a second encyclical, which treated of the audio-visual media,[70] and in 1963 by the decree Inter mirifica of the Second Vatican Council.[71] Actual progress in the—in the real sense—theoretical confrontation of the Church with the mass media was produced by an address of Pius XII in 1950 to the Third International Congress of the Catholic Press at Rome,[72] and the pastoral instruction Communio et Progressio,[73] brought about by the just mentioned conciliar decree but only prepared in 1971. Pius XII recognized and described mass communication as a social function in presenting public opinion—"natural echo," "common response"—as unalterable by natural law for the functioning of society. Unfortunately, then the decree Inter mirifica, which especially stressed the Church's right to possess and use the mass media as well as the morally "right employment of these instruments," remained "considerably behind the doctrine developed by Pius XII."[74] On the other hand, Communio et Progressio produced not only important results of modern journalistic and communications science, but presented generally relevant social principles: the function of the media as communications institutions, which gather "contemporaries around a round table, as it were," the right to information and free choice of information, freedom of communications, necessity of media pedagogy (instead of censorship and Index), acknowledgment of the untrammeled individuality of journalistic work, the claim of Catholic journalists, communications institutions, and the Catholic public to the helping partnership of the Church. Without abandoning standards—common welfare, human dignity, objectivity—the withdrawal from the "defense principle"[75] and from the moralizing discrimination between "good" and "bad" press becomes pleasantly clear.

---

[67] E. Baragli, ed., Cinema Cattolico, 2d ed. (Rome 1965); Radio Vaticana, ed., (1) Documenti Pontifici sulla Radio e sulla Televisione 1929–1962 (Vatican City 1962), (2) Documenti Pontifici sulla Stampa 1878–1963 (ibid. 1963), (3) Documenti Pontifici sul Teatro 341–1966 (ibid. 1966); also, G. Deussen, Ethik der Massenkommunikation bei Papst Paul VI. (Paderborn 1973).

[68] AAS 28(1936), 249–63.

[69] A. Paffenholz, "Katholische Filmbewertung in der Diskussion," CS 2(1969), 5–12.

[70] AAS 49(1957), 765, 805.

[71] LThK 1 (supplementary volume) (Freiburg 1966), 116–35.

[72] AAS 42(1950), 251–57.

[73] Communio et Progressio. Pastoralinstruktion über die Instrumente der sozialen Kommunikation, Nachkonziliare Dokumentation 11 (Trier 1971).

[74] O. B. Roegele, "Das Konzilsdekret 'Über die Werkzeuge der Sozialen Kommunikation,'" Publiziskik 9(1964), 305–47, here 319.

The instruction also points, by suggestions, to the absence of a journalistic organization, as it can be established in the Churches of many countries. Comprehensive tasks are attributed to the already existing international journalistic associations, while in reality these organizations, despite historical and nation unifying merits, today can do justice to their very narrow determining of functions often only with difficulty. In this connection there is question of the Union Catholique Internationale de la Presse (UCIP), founded in 1927—its precursor in 1923—UNDA (Association Catholique Internationale pour la Radiodiffusion et la Télévision) proceeding from the Bureau International de la Radiophonie Catholique, founded in 1928, and the Office Catholique International du Cinéma (OCIC).[76] The UCIP, divided professionally into five federations—newspaper and periodical publishers, news agencies, journalists, journalist science, and ecclesiastical press—and regionally into several continental subassociations, acting as international representative in appearance with world congresses of the Catholic press, sees its general aim in the fostering, organizing, and representing of the work of Catholic journalists and press associations on an international plane, especially in the spheres of activity of professional ethics and theology of mass communication, promotion of Catholic journalism in underdeveloped countries, and representation in international organizations (United Nations, UNESCO). UNDA, which owes essential impulses to the first and second International Catholic Radio Congress at Munich in 1929 and Prague in 1936, has likewise built continental subgroups in South America, Asia, and Africa, and takes care of the international cooperation as well as the interdenominational with the World Association for Christian Communication (WACC). UNDA and OCIC give international radio and film prizes respectively. The chief tasks of OCIC lie in the collaboration of about fifty national Catholic film bureaus, in the study of film art and economics in accord with Christian categories of values, in the initiating of new Catholic film movements, and in the effort for artistically and educationally worthwhile films.

---

[75] M. Schmolke, "Zehn ideengeschichtliche Beobachtungen zur Pastoralinstruktion Communio et Progressio," F. J. Eilers et al., eds., Kirche und Publizistik. Dreizehn Kommentare zur Pastoralinstruktion . . . (Paderborn 1972).

[76] J. Iribarren, "L'Union Catholique Internationale de la Presse (UCIP)," CS 3(1970), 49–55; also, on the obscurity concerning the real foundation year of the UCIP, references in UCIP Informations, no. 4/1976, p. 2, and no. 1/1977, pp. 1f. (If the UCIP celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in 1977, then it referred to the founding at Brussels in 1927 of the Bureau International des Journalistes Catholiques.) J. Schneuwly, "UNDA-Katholische Internationale Vereinigung für Hörfunk und Fernsehen," CS 3(1970), 144–51; E. Flippo, "Office Catholique International du Cinéma (OCIC)," ibid. 4(1971), 28–34.

For new international functions, namely the advisory promotion of Catholic journalism in underdeveloped countries, the Catholic Media Council was founded on the basis of the cooperation of UCIP, UNDA, and OCIC at Aachen in 1969. Its tasks are the international exchange of experience, the coordinating and advising of planning, the utilization of scholarly results, and not least the professional preexamination of concrete promotional projects. The journalistic projects of supporting Catholic auxiliary and mission works are represented on the Board of Trustees.[77] The CMC elaborates and advises projects, which are encouraged by the auxiliary works of Belgium, the Netherlands, Austria, Switzerland, England, Ireland, the United States, and Germany.

Concluding remark: The considerable theological, organizational, economic, and journalistic expense with which Catholic journalism, now as earlier, is carried out and also the (relatively late beginning) positive official teaching and pastoral attention to problems of mass communication cannot obscure the fact that at the latest since the Second Vatican Council a striking withering of integration[78] is to be observed on the part of the "Catholic public," and especially in the "strongly" Catholic journalistic countries, in which Catholic media were not able to remain traditionally conservative, but had to constantly stand out with respect to non-Catholic groups of the population, hence especially clearly in the United States, the Netherlands, Switzerland, the German Federal Republic, but also in Austria. The fact that a growing part of the potential Catholic public avoids the specifically

---

[77] K. R. Höller, "Publizistische Medienplanung für Entwicklungsländer 'Catholic Media Council,'" CS 5(1972), 57–63.

[78] On the idea cf. F. Groner, "Integrationsschwund in der katholischen Kirche Deutschlands," Jahrbuch für christliche Sozialwissenschaften 12(1971), 215–39; cf. also the contributions of H. Fleckenstein and R. Bleistein in K. Forster, ed., Befragte Katholiken-Zur Zukunft von Glaube und Kirche (Freiburg i. Breisgau 1973).

Catholic journalism, and the assured observation that this process is quantitatively similar to the decline of the numbers that attend Mass, will possibly be the characteristically basic feature of the history of Catholic journalism of the second half of the twentieth century. Documents of some postconciliar synods have sought to take this development into account, at least as a start.[79]

[79] References to literature in M. Schmolke, "Kirche und gesellschaftliche Kommunikation," D. Emeis and B. Sauermost, eds., Synode—Ende oder Anfang (Düsseldorf 1976), 303–15, as well as P. Pawlowsky, "Kirche und Massenmedien nach den österreichischen Synoden," CS 9(1976), 233–54.

CHAPTER 14

*Charity and Ecclesiastical Works of Assistance

Laying the Foundations in the Nineteenth Century

Caritas, as a turning to fellow believers and other persons who are in need, ranks alongside the proclaiming of the Good News as a basic function of the Church.[1] Hence the intensity of charitable activity is always an indicator of its spiritual vitality. However, its present social-charitable activity differs in many respects from that of previous centuries. It proceeded entirely out of the charity movement of the nineteenth century, for then were developed those ideas and working methods which, spreading from Europe, have in timely fashion influenced almost all countries. And so a look at the nineteenth century is indispensable for the understanding of the present.

The numerous secularizations became a powerful and mostly overlooked precondition of the new surge of charity in the nineteenth century—not only in the France of the Revolution, with the nationalization of the Church's property in 1790, the suppression of the orders in 1792, the nationalization of hospitals in 1793, and in the German Reich with the Imperial Delegates Final Recess in 1803, but in most countries of the North Atlantic and Iberian world they withdrew the old social institutions from the Church's control. In this way the Church lost the traditional means of support of its care of the poor, but at the same time it was relieved of the often antiquated obligations of the foundations. Accordingly, the secularizations compelled new initiatives and they facilitated the appearance of that mobility and of that large-scale concept, which, in view of the increase of population and of all those miseries accompanying industrialization, were urgently necessary. And the Church had to devote its attention to the new social problems, if it would continue to be credible. European Catholicism, particularly in France and Germany, but also in Italy, thus undertook enormous social-charitable exertions in the course of the century. They are partly explained by the conviction, generally represented until far beyond the middle of the century, that the social question could be solved only by free welfare work. Only slowly did the idea establish itself that here only state intervention with the cooperation of free personnel could help. This was introduced in the German Empire by Bismarck's social legislation of 1883–89, while other states partly followed suit much later. From these originally modest beginnings there gradually developed comprehensive social security systems and large organizations that introduced a "fundamental change of the care for existence."[2] They culminated in the concept of the "social state," which intervened in the social sphere by directing without degenerating into a total welfare state.[3] It represented the reply to the Industrial Revolution and the restratifications in the wake of the great wars and economic crises. The aims of the state were expanded in the social state to social justice and the creating and maintaining of institutions for the protection of the individual in the various situations of life. The fact that state budgets in the industrialized countries today designate up to one-third of their total for social works is eloquent testimony.

---

* Erwin Gatz

[1] Basic is R. Völkl, Dienende Kirche—Kirche der Liebe (Freiburg 1969); idem in HPTh, 2d ed. I, 415–48.

This development deeply affected ecclesiastical charity,[4] for in this way its center of gravity in the industrialized states increasingly shifted from economic to spiritual and personal help, without excluding the economic.[5] For the rest the social-charitable personnel of the Church and the social agencies of the state cooperated to a considerable extent in almost all countries, even in those where Church and state were formally separated. The Church particularly brought to this teamwork its religiously motivated collaborators, while the state offices set aside partly considerable financial means for social institutions under the Church's auspices. The Church's financial contribution for this work was based, after the loss of the old foundations, partly on Church means of taxation but chiefly on gifts.

---

[2] HPTh II/2, 396–402.

[3] H. Peters in StL, 6th ed., 7(1962), 394f.

[4] On the sociopolitical development in Germany, France, England, and the United States, see B. Seidel in Handwörterbuch der Sozialwissenschaften 9 (Göttingen 1956), 532–72.

[5] On the specifics of caritas, R. Völkl in HPTh II/2, 403–23.

Concern for the whole person is characteristic of charity on the basis of its fitting into the care of souls. But since the Enlightenment growing secularization and alienation from the Church have incessantly and increasingly questioned its denominational method. The Church's personnel, who had long devoted themselves almost without competition to the charitable tasks of a homogeneous society, could no longer entirely measure up to the growing functions. Since the nineteenth century, therefore, other agents of free welfare work have pushed themselves beside the Church's charity; among them decided Christians collaborated, and they were partly inspired by Christian motives.[6] To the secularization of society corresponded, with a certain reluctance, the secularization or laicization of social work. Today the Church is only one—even though of the utmost importance—of those social forces which are devoted to these tasks. For the rest, in opposition to an all-embracing state social and assistance policy there have not been lacking voices since the nineteenth century which claimed charity even under the changed circumstances as an unchangeable basic function of the Church, even if needing to be kept up-to-date. The demand for the unimpeded growth of the Church in the social sector also was derived from religious freedom. For this was taken from it only in totalitarian states, whereas, for example, in the German Federal Republic in 1961 precedence was accorded to the free representatives of social and youth assistance in accord with the principle of subsidiarity;[7] recently, on the other hand, tendencies making for state management are again appearing.

During the nineteenth century synods and individual bishops repeatedly recommended the traditional care of the poor,[8] but in reality official ecclesiastical initiatives in this area were isolated and locally restricted. The charity movement arose rather from its basis in the communities where it had always rested. Only in our century have an extensive and finally global view and corresponding organization established themselves.

---

[6] In the chiefly professionally exercised areas of social work religious, working virtually without compensation, dominated into the twentieth century. Lay personnel took a place beside these to a greater extent only since the financial assurance of social work. German Empire in 1883: law on the health insurance of workers; Prussia in 1885: rules for schools for nurses. In other countries also since then a stronger founding of nursing schools is to be observed (F. Bauer, Geschichte der Krankenpflege [Kulmbach 1965], 257ff.).

[7] Federal law on social aid and law on youth welfare (1961). According to these not only aid for maintaining life is assured, but "in special life conditions." A corresponding judgment of the Federal Constitutional Court at Karlsruhe on 16 October 1968: "To the self-understanding of the Christian Churches and the exercise of religion belongs not only the area of faith and worship but also freedom of development and effectiveness in the world, as this corresponds to its religious and ministerial function. Active love of neighbor is, according to the New Testament, an essential task for the Christian and is understood by the Catholic and Evangelical Churches as a basic church function" (Quoted in Caritas-Korrespondenz, Freiburg 1969-1/2, R.4).

From the nineteenth century charity was administered essentially by two groups. On the one hand, these were the various local charity groups, which at times operated without the cooperation of the clergy and often renounced any publicity. They found their classical form in the Conference of Saint Vincent de Paul, founded by Frédéric Ozanam at Paris in 1833, which became the model for similar establishments in many countries.[9] Particularly in Germany, where the ecclesiastical association system was more strongly pronounced than elsewhere, there was formed, alongside the Saint Vincent Conferences and their female counterpart, the Saint Elizabeth Conferences, a large number of groups with social-charitable and often very specialized tasks.[10] On the other hand, in recent times the parish first appeared as an institution qualified for charity,[11] but of course the activity of the traditional societies was not supposed to be affected adversely by this.

In addition to these small groups, often merged into working communities and predominantly established on the local level, from the nineteenth century the many newly founded congregations assumed the chief burden of charitable work. The Daughters of Charity were, it is true, already represented before the Revolution in some European countries but began their global expansion only in the nineteenth century. For the rest, there then appeared those occasionally wildly growing large numbers of male and female congregations, which provided for social work a mainly professional personnel, thoroughly qualified by a professional code of ethics.[12] In the territory of the

---

[8] The various provincial synods of the nineteenth century proceeded just as little beyond this as did two projected decrees of the First Vatican Council (E. Gatz in AHC 3[1971], 156–73).

[9] A. Foucault, Histoire de la Société de S. Vincent de Paul (Paris 1933). On early charity groups in Germany, see Gatz, op. cit., 351–71. On the development in the United States, see D. T. McColgan, A Century of Charity. The First One Hundred Years of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul in the United States, 2 vols. (Milwaukee 1951).

[10] Details in KH, 1907ff.

[11] J. Kessels in JbCarWiss, 1962, 9–42; Werkbuch der Caritas (Freiburg 1968); Pastorale. Caritas und Diakonie (Mainz 1974).

[12] O. Braunsberger, Rückblick auf das katholische Ordenswesen im 19. Jahrhundert (Freiburg 1901); more comprehensive: Heimbucher.

German Reich, for example, there were scarcely several hundred at the beginning of the nineteenth century, but before the First World War 47,545 female religious and 1,963 male religious in 5,036 and 101 houses, respectively, were at work.[13] In the other Catholic countries the growth was similar.[14] The founding and expansion of these communities took place to a great extent without the directing intervention of church authorities. At that time there was coordination among them only in isolated cases.

Ecclesiastical charity, like its secular counterpart, was divided since the nineteenth century into an "open" and a "closed" sphere, a distinction which the legislation of the French Revolution made. To the open sphere belong those works of assistance that can scarcely be grasped statistically, particularly as they were performed in the communities. Beside them the institutions rapidly appearing from the mid-century, and with them the "closed" work, acquired growing importance. But the most fundamental change in ecclesiastical social work since the nineteenth century lies in the elimination of the traditional care of the poor, which was concentrated on the elementary livelihood of its protégés, by a differentiated and specialized care of people in their various needs.[15] The professional formation of collaborators and the classification of the institutions in professional spheres were a self-evident consequence of this development. For the rest, educational and health assistance were not definitely separated.[16] The religious and the ecclesiastical institutions not only accepted this development but supported it to a decisive degree in the industrialized nations.[17] They not only supplied their personnel for it, but by opening up private sources of financing often first made possible the creating of such institutions. While the financing of institutions in countries with progressive social legislation is today to a great extent cared for by social security institutions or by the public, church personnel as well as other agents of free welfare in the countries of the Third World more and more finance this work largely out of their own means. The new types of social-charitable work outlined here grew in the traditionally Christian countries of Europe. In addition, an autonomous charity was able to develop also in the United States and Canada.[18] Over and above this, the European methods of work were carried by the missionary institutes into all parts of the world, since the works of love have from time immemorial been counted as an integrating part of the missionary method.[19]

---

[13] Liese, Wohlfahrtspflege und Caritas, 280.

[14] There have been statistical surveys for the entire Church for only a few years. A. Battandier, Annuaire Pontifical Catholique, 41 vols. (Paris 1898–1948), gives some material on the status of the orders. Rich in material also for the social-charitable activity: Bilan du Monde, Encyclopédie Catholique du Monde Chrétien, 2 vols. (1st ed. 1958–60, 2d ed. 1964). On the number of religious, see Annuario Statistico della Chiesa (Rome 1968ff.). Reliable statistical material for charitable achievements from the period before the First World War is available only for particular countries. The numbers of members of congregations of women supply a starting point because these devoted themselves to charitable tasks, of course in varying intensity from country to country. Baumgarten gives, among other things, the following numbers: Europe (180 million Catholics): 329,811 female religious in 25,043 houses; France (39.1): 183,901; Italy (32.9): 31,342; Spain (18.7): 25,545; Germany (19.2): 32,831; Austria-Hungary (37.6): 23,146; Netherlands (1.7): 8,110; England (1.38): 10,118; Latin America (56): 6,909; United States (10.7): 53,987, 885 welfare institutions, 249 orphanages.

[15] This change in meaning found expression in the nomenclature of theological lexica. Wetzer and Welte (2d ed. [1883]) does not yet contain the keyword caritas, but (1st ed. [1882]), 1354–75, makes a detailed contribution to the care of the poor. Similarly: RE 2, 3d ed. (1897), 92–103: care of the poor, for which, as it occurs in the Church, the principle of free will is urged (rejection of recourse to taxation). M. Buchberger, Kirchliches Handlexikon 1(1907), then gives (885f.) a brief contribution "Charitas," which in the stricter sense is described as "the totality of the systematically organized freewill assistance activity springing from religious Christian motives." The care of the poor (I, 340–44) is granted considerably more space. This changes only with LThK, 2d ed.

National Organizations

The just mentioned, almost incalculable diversity of charitable efforts illustrates that there was at work not a planned procedure but a spontaneous movement. True, there was no lack of bishops interested in charitable and later also in social-political activities, but the Church leadership, despite its good will, stood aside and made scarcely any gestures to canalize the new breakthrough. In an age of increasing entanglements and of a more spacious thought, however, this fragmentation constituted a serious danger. Individual societies, as, for example, the Conferences of Saint Vincent de Paul, quite early combined, but a coordination involving all fields of charity was only attempted from the turn of the century. In this field Germany took the lead, although the Catholics themselves here lagged behind corresponding exertions of other welfare associations.[20] Those who prepared for the founding of a [16] In the older hospitals of the nineteenth century, on the other hand, aged charges, patients, and orphans lived together.

---

[17] For the German development, see Gatz, op. cit., 464–573.

[18] Religious communities expelled from European countries in the course of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, for example, contributed to this.

[19] Cf. L. Berg, Die katholische Mission als Kulturträger, 2d ed., III (Aachen 1927), 3–200.

[20] As early as 1848 the gifted organizer Heinrich Wichern had urged the merger of the Evangelical welfare works into a "Central Committee for the Domestic Mission of the German Evangelical Church."

German charity society were the Capuchin Cyprian Fröhlich (1853–1931) and the cofounder of the Volksverein für das katholische Deutschland in 1890, the district councilor Max Brandts (1854–1905). But the project was first realized by the brilliant organizer, Lorenz Werthmann (1858–1921).[21] The Limburg priest went to Freiburg im Breisgau in 1886 as court chaplain of Archbishop Christian Roos (1886–98) and there became acquainted with the Church's social work. Important preliminary stages of the later organization were constituted by the founding of the periodical Caritas in 1895 as the first professional organ of this type in German[22] and of a "Charity Committee" as the circle of promoters of the periodical. Werthmann edited the periodical personally until his death. From 1896 the "Committee," in which Werthmann set the tone, conducted annual study meetings—Caritastage—which likewise served the spread of the idea of charity. In February 1897 it called for the founding of a Caritas Verband für das katholische Deutschland. After initial hesitations on the part of the episcopal leadership of Cologne and Freiburg because of Werthmann's independence of action, there occurred on 9 November 1897 the planned founding, with headquarters at Freiburg,[23] on the occasion of the second Caritastag at Cologne. Its aim was to be study and publication, the education of coworkers, professional charitable work, and coordination. While the organization made progress only with difficulty for two decades, despite the intensive efforts of the first president, Werthmann, the association achieved great successes in other fields.[24] This was true also of the charity science developed at Freiburg, which in 1925 acquired a scholarly institute and a chair at the university—since 1964 it has been called Institut für Caritaswissenschaft und Christliche Sozialarbeit. In addition, before the founding of the Karitasverband, Werthmann organized a special library, which gradually grew into a study center unique in its kind.[25] In the midst of the First World War the episcopal conference at Freiburg in 1915 and that at Fulda in 1916 recognized the Freiburg central office as a "legitimate gathering of the diocesan societies into one uniform organization." Thereby the early history of the association ended and its organizational rise was introduced.

The German example acted as a stimulus beyond the national boundaries. Thus in 1903 the Austrian welfare societies joined in one national merger.[26] But the charitable organization became more important in the United States[27] because of its order of magnitude. The initiative proceeded from the New York religious Barnabas of the Brothers of the Christian Schools. In youth work over the years he had felt the isolation of the individual charitable groups as a serious flaw, and in 1908 he proposed to Bishop Thomas J. Shahan, rector of the Catholic University, the convoking of a charity conference. An organizational committee then decided the establishing of a national conference, at which 400 delegates met on 25–28 September 1910 at the Catholic University. Shahan became the first president (until 1925) and William J. Kerby the secretary of the newly established National Catholic Charities Conference (NCCC). Its functions, like those of the DCV, were to be the educating and informing of the members. This was effected by working-meetings, the establishing of places of formation, and the publication of the Catholic Charities Review in 1916.[28] During the first years the horizontal connection with the charitable religious institutes was inadequate, although these then carried out 75 percent of the total work. Hence, as secretary (1920–61), John O'Grady in 1920 inaugurated the founding of the National Conference of Religious on Catholic Charities as the organ representing the congregations with the NCCC.[29]

---

[21] Liese, Werthmann; K. Borgmann, ed., Lorenz Werthmann, Reden und Schriften (Freiburg 1958).

[22] In 1896 there appeared in German thirty-four relevant periodicals. Caritas was quickly consolidated: in 1897, 2,000; in 1917–18, 10,000; in 1974, 25,000.

[23] Since 1909: Caritasverband . . .; 1919: Deutscher Caritasverband (DCV). First article: Liese, "Werthmann," 142–46.

[24] Survey: H. Wollasch in 75 Jahre DCV, 33–87.

[25] H. J. Wollasch in Caritas '71, 191f. 1971: 110,000 volumes.

The establishment of other national charity associations took place between the two world wars, especially in Europe—in Switzerland (1920), Hungary (1931), Luxemburg (1932), Belgium (1938), Ireland (1941), and Spain (1942), then in Poland and Yugoslavia and also in Syria, whereas France still held itself aloof.[30]

International Cooperation

An international charity assistance, or at least one that extended beyond the frontiers of nations, was already included in the mission to the pagans and then with the care of emigrants of the late nineteenth century.[31] Then it became a pressing need because of the misery attending wide circles of population in the countries affected by war. Alongside the national charity institutions, the Holy See, from the beginning of the war, also developed a vigorous war welfare care.[32] This concentrated on the prisoners of war and the civilian population in the occupied countries. In addition, the Holy See helped many individuals through consultation and donations. Besides this, it directed requests for help to the Catholics of the countries not greatly affected by the war. Particularly in the United States considerable donations were thereupon made; the German-Americans' awareness of solidarity with their homeland was still great and was influential as a motive for making donations.

---

[26] L. Krebs, Das caritative Wirken der katholischen Kirche im zwanzigsten Jahrhundert (1927), 2; a good survey of the diversity of charitable exertions in F. Anhell, Caritas und Sozialhilfen im Wiener Erzbistum (1802–1918), 1971.

[27] D. P. Gavin in NCE 10(1967), 229f. (biblio.).

[28] First survey of charitable activity: Directory of Catholic Charities (Washington 1922).

[29] B. M. Faivre in NCE 10(1967), 230f.

[30] Date of founding in Caritas Internationalis, 1970–72.

[31] At the Mainz Katholikentag of 1871 there was founded, at the urging of the Limburg merchant, Peter Cahensly (1838–1923), the St. Raphaelsverein zum Schutz deutscher

The foreign aid during and after the First World War had made the international cooperation of charitable works of assistance an urgent necessity. It is significant that the impetus for a permanent merger proceeded from Germany, where charity was as strictly and effectively organized as in no other country. As early as 1918 Werthmann had pointed out that an international union was necessary,[33] and in February 1920 the Catholic delegates at the congress of the Union Internationale des Secours aux Enfants at Geneva urged this desire.[34] In this way the insight was put across that a "World Charity Society" should be founded.[35] The Holy See approved the project. And so, on the occasion of the World Eucharistic Congress at Amsterdam in July 1924, at the invitation of the Preparatory International Charity Committee sixty delegates from twenty-two nations met for a four-day conference.[36] Here the establishment of a permanent "Charity Conference" with headquarters at Lucerne at the Swiss Central Office of Charity was decided.[37] The preeminent tasks were to be the uniting of all charitable organizations as well as reciprocal information, while an international aid fund could not yet be realized. Then in 1926 the second conference at Lucerne stated as its aim the promotion of all charitable efforts, the exchange of information, the beginnings of katholischer Auswanderer, which was later involved in the conflicts over "Americanism." It was among the initiators of the Commission Internationale Catholique pour les Migrations of Geneva, founded in 1951.

---

[32] Schmidlin III, 218–26; J. Kreyenpoth, Die Auslandshilfe für das Deutsche Reich (Stuttgart 1932), 56–59, 87f; see also Chapter 2.

[33] L. Werthmann in Caritas 24(1918–19), 1–6. On the beginnings of international cooperation, see J. Hafenbradl, Caritas Catholica. Internationale Caritasorganisation 1924 bis 1950 (Freiburg 1968), here 17.

[34] Protocol in Hafenbradl, appendix, 1–4.

[35] Thus, Caritas 25(1920–21), 90.

[36] K. Joerger in Caritas 29(1924), 183–88.

[37] This had been instituted in 1920.

cooperation, and finally the representation of charity in international welfare societies.[38] It also decreed the founding of the sections Iuventus, Migratio, Infirmitas, Paupertas, Sobrietas, and Literae. In 1928 the conference constituted itself as a permanent organization with the name Caritas Catholica, as Pius XI had desired, in order to emphasize the religious motivation of the work here accomplished. The director of the Caritas of Strasbourg, Paul Müller-Simonis, became the first president, and in 1938 he was succeeded by Josef Tongelen, director of the Caritas of Vienna.

That collaboration beyond national boundaries even in the inner Catholic area was not without problems appeared when a congress of charity, planned for Strasbourg in 1927, had to be canceled at the last moment because of strained German-French relations.[39] Subsequently the delegates met repeatedly in Switzerland, but international cooperation was considerably impeded after 1933 under Nazi pressure and in 1937 it was stopped.[40] Despite these setbacks, the first union of national charity associations had powerfully strengthened their solidarity. Above all, the effects of the exchange of experiences must not be lightly underestimated. Furthermore, Caritas Catholica caused the founding of new national charity associations.

Consolidation of Charity between the World Wars

After the First World War the charitable institutions in many countries were intensively consolidated. In this connection must be noted not only the improved organization but also the multiplication and the differentiation. In 1930 charity in all countries included:[41]

Closed Relief	Number of Institutions	Number of Beds	Number of Personnel
Health Care	15,700	752,000	135,000
Educational Care	13,400	668,600	70,600
Total	29,100	1,420,600	205,600

Half-Open Relief

Number of Institutions	96,300
Average Number of Daily Visitors	2,390,000

Open Relief

Number of Institutions	140,000

---

[38] K. Joerger in Caritas 5(1926), 317.

[39] Hafenbradl, 32–36.

[40] Op. cit., 45–48. The sources on this period are extraordinarily meagre.

[41] H. Auer in KH 17(1930–31), 108–201, here 118.

Personnel Active in Charitable Work

Mother-House Sisters Active in Charity	350,000
Religious Brothers Active in Charity	32,000
Other Personnel Officially Active Chiefly in Charity . . .	120,000
Total of Personnel Officially Active Chiefly in Charity . . .	502,000
Catholics Active in Charity in an Honorary Capacity . . .	6,650,000

These activities varied according to country, from the differentiated institutions in industralized states to the weakly developed structures in the Churches with Iberian backgrounds.[42] In the missions also during this epoch European models were still the pattern.[43] According to the summaries provided by L. Berg,[44] in the territories subject to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith there were the following institutions and personnel in the service of charity in 1930:

Asia (7 million Catholics):
165 physicians and 787 nurses; 293 hospitals with 18,109 beds; 1,325 pharmacies with 11,773,021 consultations; 33 leprosaria with 5,722 patients; 1,073 orphanages with 66,995 orphans; 253 homes for the elderly with 10,645 charges.

Africa (4.9 million Catholics):
30 physicians and 281 nurses; 267 hospitals with 9,470 beds; 1,074 pharmacies with 11,662,898 consultations; 59 leprosaria with 5,548 patients; 617 orphanages with 30,675 orphans; 132 homes for the elderly with 4,664 charges.

America (2.9 million Catholics):
4 physicians and 36 nurses; 53 hospitals with 1,759 beds; 130 pharmacies with 147,104 consultations; 4 leprosaria with 331 patients; 92 orphanages with 3,920 orphans; 14 homes for the elderly with 520 charges.

---

[42] KH gives information on the charitable accomplishments of Germany. For other countries the national directories give references.

[43] Rich material for the charitable activity in mission territories in: Annales de la Propagation de la Foi (Paris and Lyon 1822ff.); Missions Catholiques (Lyon and Paris 1868–1964); Die katholischen Missionen (Freiburg 1873ff.); ZMR (Münster 1911ff.).

[44] L. Berg, Christliche Liebestätigkeit in den Missionsländern (Freiburg 1935), here 19ff. He relies on Guida delle Missioni Cattoliche (Rome 1934). Detailed information on charity in mission countries (1929), which also extends beyond the areas subject to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in B. Arens, État actuel des Missions Catholiques (Louvain 1932), 151–92.

Australia, Oceania, New Zealand (2.15 million Catholics):
7 physicians and 51 nurses; 107 hospitals with 3,668 beds; 278 pharmacies with 958,570 consultations; 12 leprosaria with 1,178 patients; 126 orphanages with 9,545 orphans; 18 homes for the elderly with 1,601 charges.

European Mission Countries (.9 million Catholics):
5 physicians and 8 nurses; 51 hospitals with 3,295 beds; 7 pharmacies with 43,285 consultations; 67 orphanages with 1,855 orphans; 11 homes for the elderly with 238 charges.

Charity in the Totalitarian State

Charity in the German Reich first came into conflict with a totalitarian state after 1933. Thereby the DCV suffered severe losses, but it still was able, under its capable tactician-president, Benedikt Kreutz (1921–49), to retain the greatest part of its substance and especially its ability to function.[45] On the other hand, other free welfare associations were dissolved—in 1933 Welfare Work and Christian Workers' Aid—or incorporated into the National Socialist People's Welfare (NSV), founded in 1933, or brought into line—in 1933 the Equal Welfare Society, later actually also the German Red Cross. The concordat assured the continuation of the Church's social institutions (ARTICLE 31), and the bishops energetically exerted themselves for this. Nevertheless, after 1934, 1,200 kindergartens had to be closed or turned over to the NSV. The same fate befell 300 stations of the mobile care of the sick, 156 Travelers' Aid Societies, 136 employment exchange offices for the protection of girls, 35 seminaries for kindergarten teachers and female youth leaders, and 2 social schools for women. And in 1938 the Institute for Charity-Science at the University of Freiburg was suppressed. The Nazi state tried to limit charity as far as possible to the care of the physically or mentally handicapped. Another serious restriction was the limiting of charitable gatherings, which were of decisive significance for the funding of the work.[46] Severe losses were also experienced by the charitable orders and congregations, which before the Second World War had more than 70,000 nursing personnel in Germany.[47] In spite of the enormous need for the care of the wounded, entry into charitable communities was no longer granted after 1940, although a formal prohibition did not occur. Thereafter the number of members of institutes sharply declined in Germany.[48] After the war's end this development was stopped for only a few years. During the Nazi epoch religious also had to leave many public institutions, where they were replaced by the rival establishments of the Nazi Sisters. Caritas President Kreutz for his part had in 1937 called into existence the Caritas sisterhood for sisters not bound by enclosure—in 1939 they had 5,000 members. Finally, the war offered opportunity for the confiscation of 1,871 institutions (the total was 3,971), and 1,358 were destroyed or severely damaged by war measures.[49] Nevertheless, the DCV was able to save essential areas before the Nazi grasp and even to create new institutions for aid. Of 4,000 kindergartens, 70 percent remained under Church auspices, and the hospitals could also continue their activity. The DCV brought effective help to many persecuted by the Nazi regime.[50] On the other hand, the risk for those handicapped threatened with murder was very difficult and often useless.

---

[45] R. A. Ihorst, Zur Situation der katholischen Kirche und ihrer caritativen Tätigkeit in den ersten Jahren des Dritten Reiches (Dipl.-Arbeit Freiburg 1971); K. Borgmann, "Der Deutsche Caritasverband im 'Dritten Reich,'" 75 Jahre DCV (1972), 92–99.

[46] While the DCV collected and distributed from 27 to 30 million RM in checks and cash for the winter assistance work (WHW) in 1932–33, it obtained in 1939 from the huge yields of collections of the Nazi WHW, in which it had had to participate, a donation of only 131,000 RM (F. Klein, Christ und Kirche in der sozialen Welt [Freiburg 1956], 241).

While charity was curtailed in so many ways, the difficult situation also compelled positive new starts. Among these were the activation of parish charity and personal acts of charity not measurable by statistics.[51] And reflection on the founding and responsibilities (tasks) of the Church's social work was intensified in these years.[52]

Assistance in Emergency and Catastrophe since the Second World War

The miserable condition of millions at the end of the war and the vast displacements of populations—30 million refugees in Europe—evoked, as in 1919, a worldwide readiness to assist. The discrimination against Germans and the long period of strictly closed state boundaries of course created conditions other than after the First World War. On the other hand, the great aid organizations had meanwhile been more strictly organized and thereby made more capable of achievements.[53] The great misery also compelled charity to extraordinary exertions. Thus in 1944 Italy obtained a national charity organization in the Pontificia Opera di Assistenza. France followed in 1946 with the founding of the "Secours Catholique" by the Conference of Cardinals and Archbishops.[54] At its head stood, as secretary general, Jean Rodhain, who during the war had organized pastoral care for French prisoners of war and slave laborers in Germany. The French merger was oriented on the American and German model. In many countries appeared similar organizations, which originally were intended to alleviate actual misery but soon grew into permanent central offices.[55] All other aid institutions were surpassed by those of the American Catholics.[56] The War Relief Services (WRS), founded by the bishops in 1943, were incorporated into the National Catholic Welfare Conference (NCWC), and united the hitherto fragmented particular initiatives. They concentrated on direct help for refugees, prisoners of war, and all other victims of war. The assistance measures first beginning in Europe were soon extended to almost all countries devastated by the war. WRS worked in 1945 in sixty-two countries and throughout supported some missions, but it also claimed the cooperation of local institutions. Then when it was apparent that the organization produced by the war continued to be necessary for the future, the episcopate in 1955 renamed the WRS the Catholic Relief Services (CRS). Up to 1963 the assistance work distributed relief material (food, medicine, clothing) to a total amount of $1.25 billion overseas. The entire Catholic emergency help of the postwar period would not have been thinkable without the immense achievements of the 30 million American Catholics. These financed their activities exclusively by donations. In addition, since 1950 the American government put superfluous food at its disposal.

---

[47] On the Nazi tactics, see H. G. Hockerts, Die Sittlichkeitsprozesse gegen katholische Ordensanhörige und Priester 1936/37 (Mainz 1971).

[48] 1935: 7,500 novices; after 1940 ca. 4,000 persons could still evade the prohibition to receive novices; 1950: 3,600 novices, thereafter a strong decline.

[49] K. Borgmann in 75 Jahre DCV, 97.

[50] In 1934 Kreutz founded the Caritas-Notwerk for the thousands of discharged officials and employees. The dispossessed St. Raphaelsverein was a help to many persecuted in the emigration; L. E. Reutter, Katholische Kirche als Fluchthelfer im Dritten Reich. Die Betreuung von Auswanderern durch den St. Raphaels-Verein (Recklingshausen 1971). In 1939 there appeared in Berlin the Caritas-Reichsstelle für nichtarische Katholiken.

[51] Cf. J. Kessels in JbCarWiss (1962), 18f., 23.

[52] K. Borgmann in JbCarWiss (1957), 108.

Even before the American aid, the help of the Vatican and of Switzerland began in Germany. When later the war misery disappeared in European countries, the activity of the existing assistance works was concentrated on help in catastrophes, which had never before occurred to such a degree, as well as on measures for other countries hurt by the war and on the always smouldering problem of refugees.

---

[53] Cf. M. Vorgrimler in JbCarWiss (1958), 86–101.

[54] As early as 1936 the episcopate had attempted a merger of the French charitable institutions; N. Bayon, Le grand Q[uartier] G[eneral] de la Charité; le Secours Catholique (Paris 1955).

[55] Survey in 75 Jahre DCV, 61ff.

[56] E. E. Swanstromm in NCE 3(1967), 328f.

On the other hand, the Church's social work could not but endure considerable damage in Communist-ruled countries. In all the "People's Democracies" outside the German Democratic Republic[57] the Church's social works and institutions were nationalized or withdrawn from the influence of Church direction—Poland, U.S.S.R. in 1949,[58] China in 1950.[59] The personnel of religious institutes were partly taken into the service of the state but had to renounce any pastoral activity. Besides, various waves of refugees from countries under Communist domination repeatedly made assistance measures necessary—in 1956, for example, 200,000 refugees from Hungary. Let Hong Kong be cited as an especially striking example. The population of the Crown Colony rose through the stream of Chinese refugees from 1.5 million in 1946 to 4 million in 1966. The Catholic Church grew incomparably stronger from 30,000 in 1946 to 233,000 members in 1967. These produced wonderful accomplishments in the social sphere.[60]

Caritas Internationalis

After the war the revival of Caritas Catholica was variously stimulated,[61] but at the same time there appeared a tendency toward a dissolution of the Swiss central office and the creation of an independent bureau, perhaps also situated in Switzerland, which should cultivate contact with the non-Catholic welfare societies. Then in 1947 occurred, due to French initiative, the founding of an Auxilium Catholicum Internationale, with headquarters in Paris, for extraordinary assistance measures, which was regarded at Lucerne as an undesirable competition. The director of the Swiss Caritas, G. Crivelli, who was working for the continuation of Caritas Catholica, founded in 1924 and never dissolved, stressed on the contrary that other national societies would have to be established before an international merger.[62] At the suggestion of the Holy See there then followed in 1950 the founding of an "International Charity Conference."[63] On the occasion of the Holy Year, the president of the Pontificia Commissione di Assistenza, Ferdinando Baldelli, after consultation with the Papal Secretariat of State, had invited the national societies to a study meeting at Rome from 12 to 15 September 1950. At this appeared sixty delegates from twenty-two nations, including the directors of twelve national charity associations.[64] The desire of the Secretariat of State was a stronger and more systematic organization on the international level. A central office should serve for coordination, information, and representation, but the delegates expressed concerns in regard to the future autonomy of the national associations. Nevertheless, on the last day of the conference they united for the establishing of an "International Charity Conference" with headquarters at Rome. This should take care of the tasks mentioned but not attack the individuality and autonomy of its member organizations. The statutes, which the Holy See approved in 1951 ad experimentum, envisaged as organs the general assembly, an executive committee, a general secretariat, and delegations at international organizations.[65] The national episcopates, informed by the Secretariat of State, approved the new foundation, except for the United States, where at first there were reservations. At the founding meeting on 12 and 13 September 1951, of the twelve delegations only two non-European, those from the United States and Canada, were represented. The meeting took the positions envisaged by the statutes, according to which it sought the greatest possible international distribution. In the executive committee the chief Catholic countries were represented—the United States, France, and Germany, also Italy and, as representatives of the smaller nations, the Netherlands, Canada, and Spain. The delegation at the United Nations was given to Switzerland. Baldelli of Italy became president, and O'Grady of the United States vice-president. Karl Bayer, a German hitherto active on the Pontificia Commissione di Assistenza, was elected secretary general. The meeting confirmed Rome as headquarters of the conference, but expressly desired that the secretariat be accommodated outside Vatican City. Preeminent tasks were to be the gaining of other national societies, the making of contact with the United Nations, and the creating of an agency in New York. The budget for the first fiscal year, which was proportioned among the participating associations—United States 28 percent, Luxemburg 2 percent—was a quite modest twelve thousand United States dollars.

---

[57] Caritasarbeit. Jahresbericht '70 (Berlin 1971) names the following Catholic social institutions: 234 institutions with 12,567 beds; 165 half-open institutions with 8,190 places; 191 nursing stations; 550 other social assistance institutions; thirty-nine places for education and continuing formation.

[58] In China in 1948 there were, among other things, 254 Catholic orphanages and 196 hospitals with 81,628 beds (HK 5[1950], 201).

[59] The Caritas of the U.S.S.R., entirely under state control and state-financed, in 1955 ran 115 institutions with 9,300 beds. Its name is the only thing it has in common with the ecclesiastical organizations (HK 10[1955–56], 109).

[60] Details in Caritas Hong Kong. Annual Report 1971–1972. According to this, church representatives here support, among other things, four hospitals, four homes for girls, two centers for professional education, seven kindergartens, and seven social centers.

[61] Cf. W. Wiesen in StdZ 72(1946), 42f.; also, Hafenbradl, 53ff., and appendix, 33–44.

---

[62] Thus at the Central European Charity Conference of 1948 at Lucerne. Protocol in Hafenbradl, appendix, 57–69.

[63] Also the unpublished work of G. Wopperer, "Caritas Internationalis, Entwicklung, Organisation und Tätigkeit," Ms. 1957; C. Bayer, K. Joerger in An der Aufgabe gewachsen, 194f.

[64] Hafenbradl, 70f. The non-European countries were represented only by the chairmen of the NCCC of the United States.

[65] The statutes have since then been often modified, most recently in 1972, and published as a special printing.

In spite of this restricted framework, the general secretariat displayed a vigorous activity. It established the connection with the national member organizations and divided, as had the earlier Caritas Internationalis, into particular professional groups. It placed special importance on information[66] and the compiling of archives. The delegations in New York and Geneva promoted collaboration with international delegations and with agencies of the United Nations. The organization renamed in 1954 Caritas Internationalis quite early gained consultative status in the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), in the International Assistance Work for Children (UNICEF), and in the Food and Agricultural Organization (FAO) of the United Nations. Caritas Internationalis had considerable success also in the promoting of charity in those countries which hitherto had no corresponding organizations. Following a journey by Bayer through Latin America to gain information and recruits, many national associations appeared there in 1955–56.[67] Corresponding foundations also occurred in Africa and Asia, and, while only twelve countries were represented at the first meeting in 1950, the number of members grew to eighty in 1972. Correspondingly the central service offices were completed.[68] Over and above this, there took place in 1954 the coordination with the Société de Saint-Vincent-de-Paul at Paris and the Association Internationale des Charités de Saint-Vincent-de-Paul at Paris, and in 1958 that with the Confédération Internationale Catholique des Institutions Hospitalières of Nijmegen, which participated as permanent observers in the general assemblies and on the executive committee. To the earlier existing delegations was added in 1968 another at UNESCO in Paris. Further, Caritas Internationalis displayed a vigorous assistance in catastrophes, for example, in floods—in the Netherlands and Belgium in 1953—earthquakes, and political complications, for example, in 1954 the care of refugees from Vietnam, in 1956 the care of refugees from Hungary, and in 1970 aid to Biafra.

---

[66] Since 1955 there appears regularly the service for news and information, Intercaritas, in German, and at somewhat longer intervals also in English, French, and Spanish.

[67] Best survey: Caritas Internationalis 1970–1972.

[68] Ibid.

Catholic Works of Assistance

From the middle of this century there appeared a completely new understanding of charity that was actually revolutionary because of the separation from preaching. This resulted from the insight, more and more penetrating into awareness, that the Church also must make a contribution to the development of the Third World.[69] Ecclesiastical social work in its manifold specializations was from time immemorial bound up with the mission, and as late as 1962 T. Ohm emphatically demanded the inclusion of charity in evangelization. "A mission which disregards the really religious for the 'social gospel' is no mission."[70] The population explosion and the spread of the industrial types of society led, however, in the Third World to a pauperism whose dimensions far exceeded the problems of the industrial society coming into being in the nineteenth century. The missionaries now had to show very impressive achievements in the social sector; education oriented to economic and technical progress, hence to self-development, had been, on the other hand, disregarded by them.[71] Basically they did not question the colonial foundation. Even before most former colonies had obtained political independence, a new awareness of responsibility and a reorientation of social work for the countries of the Third World established themselves. Classical charity was not suspended by this fact but it was supplemented by "help for self-help," hence the encouragement of self-development. In motivation this is identical with its older sister but it must be clearly separated from preaching and no longer understands itself, as the former did, as an indirect mission. On the other hand there are also assistance works which accomplish decidedly pastoral works of development.

This new type of charitable activity has not been able to establish itself equally in all countries.[72] The largest of the Catholic assistance organizations, CRS, began, for example, in 1960 with its own projects of help in development, but, then as earlier, stressed direct help. The new idea made itself most strikingly felt in the German Federal Republic. At the suggestion of Vicar General Josef Teusch of Cologne, who thereby took up the initiatives of various Catholic groups and societies, Cardinal Frings proposed to the German Episcopal Conference in 1958 the founding of the activity Misereor against hunger and sickness in the world.[73] The business office was erected at Aachen, and in this way the intimate relationship with the German branch of the papal work of spreading the faith, missio, then located there, was expressed. Nevertheless, Misereor was supposed to be run not as a mission but as an enterprise for assisting development. The first collection on Palm Sunday 1959, with a yield of 33.4 million German marks, surpassed all expectations and contributed to the rapid consolidation of the new foundation. The donations of those attending Mass—up to 1973 they amounted to 786.7 million German marks—constitute the decisive source of revenue of the bishops' assistance work. The choice of project, which a professional committee decides, is concentrated not on direct aid for the signs of misery but tries to deal with the causes and to foster personal initiative. On the other hand, the aid of the German Catholics for catastrophes is directed by the DCV. The "Workers' Community for Development Aid," founded in 1959 by Misereor and other Catholic societies, serves also the enlisting, preparing, and informing of helpers in development—by 1974 there were some seventeen hundred.

---

[69] On the principles, see J. Schmauch in HPTh IV, 618–23.

[70] T. Ohm, Machet zu Jüngern alle Völker (Freiburg 1962), 639–658, here 657.

[71] Cf. C. Erb in HPTh IV, 624–45.

[72] Ibid., 629–39.

[73] U. Koch, F. Merz in KH 26(1969), 435–42.

In addition, the German bishops in 1961 established the activity Adveniat to support the pastoral tasks of the Church in Latin America.[74] The activity, first conceived as a single collection for the education of priests, was finally continued as all-embracing aid for the carrying out of pastoral care in Latin America. Up to 1972 the German Catholics spent 621.1 million German marks for this end—the Christmas collection. That clear distinction and organizational separation of development and pastoral assistance which is practiced in the German Federal Republic, has not been imitated everywhere, for the aid works of other nations, which appeared partly at the same time or a little later, often unite other functions with development aid.[75] This is true, for example, of the "Lenten Sacrifice of the Swiss Catholics." Its means are divided, since the founding in 1962, by thirds among development aid, the foreign missions, and domestic Swiss projects. Naturally, the desire to give development aid directly or indirectly to the foreign missions, especially in lands with an old mission tradition, is lively. Moreover, the implementation of many projects is referred to the missionary substructure and is carried out in a certain personal connection with the mission work. There were precursors of the later aid works in various countries—in England the Miss-A-Meal Movement, in Austria in 1958 family fast day—but the real wave of foundations began only with the Second Vatican Council, which confronted bishops and Catholicism with worldwide problems. During the council occurred the founding of episcopal aid works in Belgium (in 1961 Carême de Partage, later Entraide et Fraternité/Broederlijk Delen), the Netherlands (in 1961 Bisschoppelijke Vastenaktie), in France (in 1961 Comité Catholique contre la Faim et pour le Développement), in England and Wales (in 1963 Catholic Fund for Overseas Development), in Austria (in 1964 Koordinierungsstelle für internationale Entwicklungsförderung), and in Australia (in 1964 Committee for Overseas Relief). Individual new foundations first concentrated on strictly defined projects, in which the former colonial ties played a role—Belgium in Zaire, France in its former African colonies. Since then the notion has increasingly expanded to become global.

---

[74] H. Lüning in KH 26(1969), 422–52.

[75] Survey: CIDSE, Brussels 1974.

The first stimuli for the cooperation of the national assistance works were expressed even before the council. In 1960 a small group of experts urged this concern on the occasion of the Eucharistic Congress at Munich. But the formal initiative for a foundation came only four years later, when on 5 November 1964, during the third session of the council, Cardinal Frings appealed to the episcopal conferences of all countries for the establishing of aid works against hunger, poverty, sickness, and illiteracy. Beyond this he suggested the international merger of already existing organizations. This impulse found a very positive echo among the council fathers. Other discussions of this question as well as the temporary founding of a workers' community with a view to the instituting of a center of information and coordination on 8 May 1965 went back to Frings's suggestion. The episcopal conferences represented in it—Belgium, German Federal Republic, France, Netherlands, Austria, Switzerland, United States—decreed on 18 November 1965, with the consent of the Holy See, the founding of a permanent workers' community and of a secretariat, which in 1966 took up its activity in Brussels. The national character and autonomy of the members of this Coopération Internationale pour le Développement Socio-Economique (CIDSE) were thereby not touched. Its directing agency is the general assembly, which meets about every three years. It decides the principles and functions of the CIDSE. In addition there are an administrative committee ("Commission"), which determines the activity of the secretariat, and a managing board of directors. The secretary general is at the same time secretary of the general assembly, of the commission, and of the management committee and directs the secretariat. The first chairman of CIDSE was Cardinal Frings. His successors were Cardinal Bernhard Alfrink of Utrecht, Cardinal Leo Josef Suenens of Brussels, Hans Peter Merz of Misereor of Aachen, and Meinrad Hengartner, a Swiss. Since 1967 the secretary general has been August Vanistendael.

The goal of CIDSE consisted from the first neither in the giving of their means by its members nor in the imparting of instructions, but in coordination, information, and consultation. Hence, among other things, all projects were registered at Brussels and a comprehensive card file of experts was compiled. In addition, CIDSE stimulated the instituting of other assistance works, which meanwhile are no longer restricted to the industrialized nations, but have found admittance to the Third World. Such assistance works appeared in Malawi—in 1968 the Christian Service Committee of the Churches in Malawi—where the work overlaps the denominations, also in Canada (in 1969 the Canadian Catholic Organization for Development and Peace), Thailand (in 1968 the Catholic Council of Thailand for Development), Indonesia (in 1971 Lembaga Penelitian Dan Pembangunam Sosial), Rhodesia (in 1972 the Commission on Social Service and Development), and finally Ireland (in 1973 Trocaire), the Caribbean (in 1973 Christian Action for Development in the Caribbean—ecumenical), and Nordic countries (in 1969 Nordisk Katolsk Utvecklingshjaelp), and Spain (in 1974 Secretariado de Cooperación al Desarrollo). The Australian assistance work, on the contrary, disappeared because it cooperated more powerfully with Caritas Internationalis.

The working methods of the assistance works are varied and are not impaired in their respective characteristics. In this regard aid for the Third World is often united with measures inside the donor country. Naturally, this applies especially to the assistance works of the underdeveloped countries. While large assistance works, such as Misereor, can take into consideration extensive programs and greater projects, the smaller assistance works are restricted to partial programs or small projects.

The financing of aid activity is based primarily on donations (collections) of the faithful. In their differing amounts is without doubt expressed something of the vitality of Catholicism in the various countries. On the other hand, the statistics of CIDSE comprise, it is estimated, only a fourth of the aid-means for development produced by Catholics, for the accomplishments made by religious communities and particular groups or individuals appear in no list. The donation yield of assistance works related to CIDSE amounted in 1973 to 50.1 million United States dollars,[76] not counting Spain, Ireland, and the United

---

[76] CIDSE News Bulletin of April 1974 gives the following individual sums: German Federal Republic 35,924,181 in American dollars, Canada 2,928,888; Austria 2,479,334; Belgium 3,134,292; Scandinavian countries 49,431; France 1,339,358; England and Wales 664,437; Netherlands 2,347,499; Switzerland 2,049,941. Very informative is the per capita yield of donations in the individual countries. This amounted in the German Federal Republic to 1.32 American dollars; Canada .34; Austria .37; Great Britain 1.15; Belgium .35; France .03; Netherlands .46; Switzerland

States. In the Netherlands, the German Federal Republic, Switzerland, and Canada the Church's aid projects for development were financed also out of state means.[77] Despite initial hesitations this cooperation has not operated to the detriment of the Church's independence, since the donation occurred exclusively in accord with objective aspects. If regard is had, in addition, for the very large sums for aid from CRS, which of course to a great extent are made possible by the government because of the presence of superfluous food, which must not be regarded as real development help,[78] as well as of the donation yield of Adveniat, which like Caritas Internationalis, is equally a consultative member of CIDSE, then the total value of help provided in 1973 by these organizations amounted to 248,342,155 United States dollars.

The functions of the papal commission Iustitia et Pax, founded in 1966, lie in the area of study and promotion, not of social action. And the council Cor unum, founded by Paul VI in 1971, is intended to further the more intensive cooperation of charity and development aid as well as agents in any way occupied with them.[79]

There has never been any dearth of official church recommendations of the traditional care of the poor. But only the Second Vatican Council found, on the basis of experiences endured for a century, a new view and expressly approved and recommended the social-charitable activity as well as the ecclesiastical development aid meanwhile developed. True, there is no special conciliar document which is devoted to charity or development aid, but expressions on them are found in various contexts.[80] According to these, charity is acknowledged as the Church's basic function and activity. This is true not only for the ethos of the turning to those suffering need but also for organized charitable activity, which is expressly, even in its branches extending beyond denominations, approved and recommended. Unambiguous also is the profession of development aid, for which clear norms are given in

---

.82 (per Catholic). These donations were used for, among other purposes, the following fields: education 22.55 percent, health care 18.48 percent, agriculture 16.05 percent.

[77] CEBEMO (Netherlands): 7,531,797 American dollars; Central Office for Development Aid (German Federal Republic); 22,183,599; CIDA (Canada): 1,761,882.

[78] In 1973: 138,947,516 American dollars. The surplus means herein contained came from state donations.

[79] On 15 July 1971 Paul VI outlined this distribution of functions in a letter to Cardinal Secretary of State Villot.

[80] In detail in Völkl, Dienende Kirche, 260–338; cf. particularly the decree on the apostolate of the laity, ART. 8, and the pastoral constitution, ART. 86; R. Völkl, Diakonie und Caritas in den Dokumenten der deutschsprachigen Synoden (Freiburg 1977).

ARTICLE 86 of the pastoral constitution. Their aim is full human development—"plena perfectio humana"—which indeed refers to the aid of the industrial nations, but primarily challenges the capabilities and traditions of the Third World—"non solis opibus alienis, sed propriis plene explicandis necnon ingenio et traditione propria colendis." Thus were the principles originally formulated and practiced in the North Atlantic world accepted for the Universal Church.

CHAPTER 15

*History of the Ecumenical Movement

The Development of the World Council of Churches and Its Route from Amsterdam (1948) to Nairobi (1976)

The beginnings of the ecumenical movement go back to the nineteenth century. Neither theology nor church leaders supplied the impetus to it, but rather the free groups of religious renewal, which were partly in conscious opposition both to the theology of the Enlightenment and to organized ecclesiastical systems. In addition to the Oxford Movement in the area of Anglicanism, there were above all associations of youth and of the Christian Student Movement. The Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) and the Young Women's Christian Association (YWCA), founded in England in 1844 and 1854 respectively, soon spread to Europe and North America. Supranational and supradenominational and also organized in an emphatically evangelical and missionary context, they were referred from their own center to the ecumene. In contrast to the liberal theology of the time, persons were convinced that the unity of the Church could be found only on the basis of a clear creed. This was expressed in the Paris basic formula of the YMCA of 1855, which begins thus: "The Young Men's Christian Association has the aim of joining such young men together who acknowledge Jesus Christ, in accord with Scripture, as their God and Saviour." Here was unmistakably prepared the later basic formula of the World Council of Churches. At first the YMCA acquired importance for the founding of the Christian Students' World Union, which was joined at Vadstena in Sweden in 1895 by the student movements of many countries in the Protestant sphere. From it or the YMCA respectively proceeded the leaders of the ecumenical movement of the twentieth century, such as John R. Mott (1865–1955), Nathan Söderblom (1866–1931), and Willem A. Visser 't Hooft (b. 1900).

---

* Erwin Iserloh

Mott had played a decisive role in the preparing and implementing of the World Mission Conference of Edinburgh in 1910, which was intended to bring the various mission societies to collaboration. This was first institutionally assured in a continuing committee (1910–20) and then in the International Mission Council, which from 1921 to 1942 was under Mott's chairmanship. From the World Mission Conference at Edinburgh proceeded the decisive impetus to the ecumenical movement. If, according to John 17:23, the credibility of the Christian message depends on the unity of Christians, then the disunion in the mission, with its numerous mission societies working alongside and in opposition to one another, could only be experienced with the greatest pain.

At Edinburgh questions of faith and of ecclesiastical organization were excluded, but no agreement on them was to be expected. On the basis of this procedure it was possible to gain the cooperation of the High Church branch of the Anglican Church. Catholics and Orthodox were not invited.

The practical experience expressed by the American missionary bishop from the Philippines, Charles Brent (1862–1929), that one could not stop at practical collaboration but must ask questions precisely about doctrinal differences for the sake of unity, gave the stimulus to the movement Faith and Order. At a preparatory conference in Geneva in 1920 the Protestant Churches of Germany and France were not represented. Those of Switzerland declined to participate officially because among them there was no assumption that faith in the divinity of Christ must be acknowledged as an essential dogmatic basis. A continuing committee took over the rest of the preparation until finally on 3 August 1927 the first World Conference for Faith and Order could meet at Lausanne. There were 385 men and nine women representing 108 ecclesial communities. The reports of the work groups on the themes unity of the Church, its message, its nature, its creed, its function, its sacraments, and on the unity of Christianity and the separated Churches were not adopted, but only received for transmission to the Churches. The experience of the great difficulties which opposed unification produced a salutary sobriety. There was a willingness not to conceal contradictions but honestly to expose them. Above all, the Orthodox were concerned with stating their viewpoint clearly. With them and the Anglicans the Protestants came into contact with a strongly ecclesiological-sacramental mentality; on the other hand, the Lutherans' fear of everything institutional and hence of a concrete Church became obvious.

From the experience "Doctrine separates—service unites" the movement Life and Work movement sought to prepare on another route, namely, through practical work for peace and social work, on the international level of the ecumene. At the meeting of the World Union for the Work of the Friendship of the Churches in 1919 at Oud Wassenaer near The Hague and following its activity and the exertions of the International Conciliation Union, Bishop Nathan Söderblom (1866–1931) of Uppsala urged a world conference on questions of social ethics. Dogmatic questions were to be excluded. Progress resulted more quickly than in the case of Faith and Order. As early as 1925 the World Conference for Life and Work was able to meet at Stockholm. It was the first expressly ecumenical conference. Representatives of all the great ecclesial communities, except the Roman Catholic Church, were present. The importance of the conference lay, of course, more in the fact that it took place at all than in its content and outcome. Brilliant festive gatherings and worship services could not conceal the deep dissents. If some, chiefly the Anglo-Saxons, intended to bring about the Kingdom of God by a constituting of social conditions in accord with God's world plan, others believed, especially the German Lutherans, that they must stress the transcendence of God's Kingdom and its eschatological character. The conference was carried further in a continuing committee with various working groups, which from 1930 on was active in Geneva as the World Conference for Life and Work.

The relationship of German Protestantism to the ecumenical movement was considerably disturbed between the two world wars. If after 1918 "ecumenical cooperation was immensely impeded"[1] by the thesis of the sole guilt of Germany for the outbreak of the world war in the Treaty of Versailles, the question of attitude toward the Nazi state was posed for ecumenical groups from 1933. This problem was especially delicate when two German groups, the "German Evangelical Church" and the "Confessing Church" exerted themselves for recognition and collaboration. The World Council for Life and Work expressed itself in support of the Confessing Church and in 1934 decided to discuss at the next world conference the theme "Church, State, and People." For, because of the rise of totalitarian states, this old theme had caught fire in a new, even more acute form. The continuing committee of Faith and Order declared, on the other hand, for the admission of representatives of the official German Evangelical Church. The difficulty was removed when the Nazi state made participation in the world conference impossible for both groups—as for German delegations in general.

The suggestion of the World Conference for Life and Work at

---

[1] A. Deissmann, Die Stockholmer Weltkirchenkonferenz (Berlin 1926), 749; M. Pribilla, Um kirchliche Einheit (Freiburg 1929), 97–100.

Oxford in July 1937 to combine the two movements into a corporation and establish a World Council obtained also the assent of the Conference for Faith and Order at Edinburgh in August 1937. A committee discussed the constituting of the World Council at Utrecht in 1938. But because of the outbreak of war a plenary meeting could no longer be convoked. Not until 1948 did there occur at Amsterdam the establishing of the World Council of Churches; Faith and Order was to continue as a committee of the council and deal with questions of doctrine.

The first plenary meeting of the World Council of Churches at Amsterdam from 22 August to 4 September 1948 stood under the theme: "The Confusion of the World and God's Plan of Salvation." The basic formula adopted at the start reads: "The World Council of Churches is a community of Churches which acknowledge our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour." According to the constitution, not individuals or associations but only Churches can be members. For at stake is a community of autonomous Churches, not a "superchurch." The World Council may be a help to the member Churches in their efforts for unity and in matters which can be done in common. "But it is alien to the council to wish to seize upon any functions which belong to the member Churches or to control them or wish to enact laws for them."[2]

At Amsterdam 147 Churches were represented by 351 delegates from forty-seven countries. Fundamentalist Protestant groups, for example, the Lutherans of the Missouri Synod of North America, had refused to join, because they missed a clear and solid dogmatic position and, a few days before the meeting of the plenary assembly, had founded the International Council of Christian Churches.

The Orthodox were represented chiefly through envoys of the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople and of the Greek Church. A gathering of the heads of the autocephalous Churches under the direction of the Patriarch of Moscow had declined participation in the World Conference. The Roman Catholic Church also was not represented; only individual theologians had obtained permission from the Curia for private participation.

The plenary meeting at Amsterdam had the task of giving the World Council a constitution and, in view of the world torn apart and bled to death by the war, to gain clarity on the mandate of Christianity in and for the world. In Section 1, under the direction of Bishop Hanns Lilje and with the cooperation of Karl Barth, the unity of the Church and inner renewal were stressed under the theme "The Church in God's

---

[2] Constitution of the World Council of Churches of 30 August 1948 in Die Unordnung der Welt und Gottes Heilsplan V (Tübingen 1948), 168.

Plan of Salvation." In this connection it became obvious that the ideas of the unity of the Church differed very deeply.

There were serious conflicts in the "political" Sections 3—"the Church and the dissolution of the social order"—and 4—"the Church and international disorder." Here the world political and ideological struggle between East and West entered. It was bluntly stated in the talks of the American John Foster Dulles (1888–1959) and of the Prague theology professor Joseph L. Hromadka (1889–1969). In opposition to the harsh rejection of atheistic and materialistic Communism by Dulles, Hromadka offered an emotional criticism of the capitalistic West. The conference saw itself facing the task of upholding the Christian community despite all "Iron Curtains" and at the same time of standing up for human liberty and social justice. It was stressed that "Christianity must not be identified with any particular system" and there was a warning against a bringing of the Church into line with a totalitarian system. In Section 3 it was emphasized as a supplement that the preserving of their independence in the face of the conformity and conflicts of the world must not mean any world-alienating neutrality of the Churches.

Amsterdam was only a beginning. It aimed to clarify, deepen, and expand the theological range of the very generally held basic formula and to find the right working method of the World Council. If there was great caution in the programmatic claim, it was hoped all the more, thanks to the importance of the institution and the sharing in dialogue and in work, to create ecumenical facts, which would in time permit it to proceed more energetically to the question of truth. In the declaration of the Central Committee at Toronto in 1950, "The Church, the Churches, and the World Council," it was again emphasized: "The World Council of Churches is not and must never become a super church. It is not the 'World Church.' It is also not the 'Una Sancta,' of which there is mention in the creed. . . . Each Church reserves to itself, in accord with its constitution, the right to ratify or reject the statements or actions of the council. . . . Within the World Council there is room for the ecclesiology of every Church which is ready to share in the ecumenical dialogue. . . . From the membership it does not follow that every Church must see the other member Churches as Churches in the true and full meaning of the word."[3]

This declaration was intended to make easy the admission of the Orthodox Churches into the World Council. In addition to individual small national Churches and the Russian Church-in-exile, only the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople and the Church of Greece had become members of the World Council at Amsterdam in 1948. The patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem had soon followed. Favored by the change of Moscow's foreign policy after the death of Stalin (1879–1953), efforts were made, especially by the Evangelical Church of Germany, for contacts with Russia. In August 1956 the Central Committee of the World Council met in Hungary. At the same time the patriarch of Constantinople, Athenagoras I (1886–1972), worked for a collaboration of all Orthodox Churches, including that of Russia. This led to the Pan-Orthodox conferences on Rhodes since 1961 and to the entry of the Churches of Russia, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Poland into the World Council at New Delhi. Here on 19 November 1961 met the third plenary assembly of the World Council of Churches under the slogan: "Jesus Christ—Light of the World." The second plenary assembly had taken place at Evanston on Lake Michigan in 1954. At New Delhi the International Council of the Mission was integrated into the World Council as an autonomous section, the Commission for World Mission and Evangelization.

---

[3] Quoted from Kirchliches Jahrbuch der EKD, 1951, 78 (Gütersloh 1952), 225–29.

The Orthodox stood up for giving the status of an autonomous section to Faith and Order, hitherto only a report of the division of studies, and thereby to give greater weight to the question of truth. Their demands and questions facilitated also the acceptance of the Trinitarian expansion of the Christological basic formula. It now reads: "The World Council of Churches is a community of Churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ in accord with Holy Scripture as God and Saviour, and therefore try in common to fulfill that to which they are called, to the honor of God, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit." Especially the "young Churches," whose importance the selection of the meeting place within the Asiatic world intended to stress, urged the early realization of visible unity of the Churches and intercommunion. The detailed report of Section 3, "Unity," took this into account; it was approved "whole and entire" by the plenary assembly and recommended to the churches for study. In emphasizing the necessity of visible unity it meant, according to Edmund Schlink, "a real progress on the way to overcoming an ecclesiological Docetism."

Meanwhile, 198 member Churches belonged to the World Council. At New Delhi for the first time an official Roman Catholic delegation was present at the plenary meeting of the World Council, with five representatives of the Secretariat for the Unity of Christians at Rome and two representatives of Cardinal Gracias of Bombay. The "World Responsibility of the Churches," since Amsterdam in 1948 the prevailing theme of the conferences of the World Council, came strongly to the foreground since 1966, the year of the change in the general secretariat from W.A. Vissert 't Hooft to Eugene Carson Blake. The World Conference for Church and Society at Geneva in 1966, the third following Stockholm in 1925 and Oxford in 1937, which was predominantly occupied with social ethical questions, was supposed to give "the Christian reply to the technical and social revolution of our age." It was marked by a top-heaviness of laity and by an almost equally strong representation of the Churches of Africa, Asia, and Latin America as of those of Western Europe and North America. Experts and the disconcerted were supposed to speak to the Churches and there were discussions of their answer to the challenges of the revolutionary changes of the day.

Out of the conviction that the social responsibility of Christians must not be limited to the personal relations of the individual Christian to his neighbor, "Love through Structures" became a chief slogan of the conference and revolution theology a heated topic of discussion. In the message of the conference it was said: "As Christians we must stand up for change. . . . Today many of those who devote themselves to the service of Christ and their neighbor take a more radical and revolutionary position. They in no way deny the value of tradition and social order but they are in search of a new strategy, by the aid of which basic changes can be carried out in society without too great a loss of time. . . . At the present time it is important that we recognize the deeper mooring of this radical position in Christian tradition and give it a rightful place in the life of the Church. . . ."[4]

The conference demanded active participation of the Christian Church in the struggle for racial equality. The World Council of Churches was supposed to establish, among other things, a secretariat for the elimination of racism. This change to social and political commitment determined the theme of the fourth plenary assembly, which met at Uppsala from 4 to 20 July 1968, under the scriptural text, "See, I make all things new," and saw as signs of the time "sensational steps into a new scientific land, the protest of rebel students, the alarm over political murder and hostile clashes." In view of the reports, emotionally delivered before 704 delegates, many guests, and journalists, on "Rich and Poor Nations," "Racism or World Community," "Christianity and Human Rights," "Work of the Church in a Revolutionary World," it became difficult to bring the "gospel of conversion" to accommodation with the "gospel of social responsibility."[5] This tension, further sharpened since 1969 by the development of an ecumenical program for the fighting of racism and a call to the member Churches for donations for the support of liberation organizations, drove the World Council into the shattering test of a polarization. According to the resolution of the Central Committee at Addis Ababa in 1971 the money must not be used for military purposes. Further, a study on violent and nonviolent methods for causing social change was to be undertaken.

---

[4] H. Kruger, ed., Ökumenische Bewegung 1965–1968, Beiheft z. Ök. Rundschau no. 12/13 (Stuttgart 1970), 334.

[5] Message of the fourth plenary assembly, from Ökumenische Bewegung 1965–1968, 446f.

In 1972 with the choice of Philip Potter, a Methodist from Jamaica, a Christian of the Third World became secretary general of the World Council of Churches. At the conference of the Commission for World Mission and Evangelization of the World Council at Bangkok from 29 December 1972 to 8 January 1973, with the theme "Salvation of the World—Today," the delegates from Africa, Asia, and blacks from the United States were in a majority. "Salvation" was understood with the strong stress on "liberation," the work of salvation seen as a fight against exploitation, political suppression, and alienation. The aloofness from the Western Churches because of their "membership in colonial power structures" went as far as the demand for a "moratorium": at least temporarily the Churches of the Western world should stop sending out persons and money.

The geographical proximity to the great Asiatic religions suggested dialogue with them as a particular section theme. Thereby was posed the question of the right of mission, and the danger of a syncretism became acute in connection with the demand for "contextualizing" of the Christian message or the making of Christianity indigenous in the cultures of the Third World.

To judge from the preparations, the accent at the fifth plenary meeting, which took place from 23 November to 10 December 1975 at Nairobi, Kenya, with the theme "Christ liberates and unites," should have been placed on internal world problems, such as racism, sexism, and education. The great majority of the 757 delegates from 271 member Churches (with observers, advisers, and journalists there were ca. 2,300 participants) decided, however, for the theological themes of Sections 1 ("confession of Jesus Christ") and 2 ("unity of the Church"), and rising opposition, especially from the delegates of Orthodoxy, thwarted a slipping into the horizontal. The One Church was understood as a conciliar community of congregations which profess the same faith, celebrate the same baptism and the same Lord's Supper, and recognize the spiritual officers of the others. It was obvious that the World Council of Churches is not this conciliar community but is to prepare it. Worship, scriptural work, and spirituality occupy a broad space. Thus Nairobi became a "spiritual happening." In a "spirituality for combat," or, better, a "spirituality of commitment" the effort was made to recover the positive uniting of the proclamation of Christ and of social responsibility. It was attempted to surround anti-racism with a large program for the realization of human rights. Thus there was compulsion also to deal with the situation in the Soviet Union. The denial there of religious liberty led to the harshest debates; as generally at Nairobi, however, the course in this question also stood for integration and compromise. But the World Council of Churches will not fulfill its task with a passage from a "conflict ecumene" to a "community ecumene," if, as Lortz says, this is an "ecumene without truth."

The Share of the Roman Catholic Church in the Ecumenical Movement

With the participation of Catholic delegates in the plenary assembly in New Delhi a deeply rooted hesitation of the Roman Curia vis-à-vis ecumenical meetings was overcome. Convinced that it, and in the full sense only it, visibly represented the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic Church founded by Jesus Christ, the Roman Catholic Church was concerned that this claim could be made relative if it sat down with other ecclesial communities at the conference table.

To the invitation from the Scandinavian Lutheran archbishops to Pope Benedict XV to send representatives to Uppsala for an ecumenical conference on 8 September 1918, Cardinal Secretary of State Gasparri asserted that everything would be agreeable to the Pope which operated for peace and Christian brotherhood, because it "smooths the path for what the Gospel expresses in the words: 'that there may be one flock and one shepherd.'"[6] But there was no mention of a representation of the Pope at the proposed conference. Instead, on 4 July 1919 a decree of the Holy Office forbade any participation in congresses for the promotion of unity without the permission of the Holy See. As early as 16 May 1919 Benedict XV had given the decision to a delegation which brought him the invitation to the conference of Faith and Order: "The teaching and practice of the Roman Catholic Church in regard to the unity of the visible Church of Christ are well known to everyone, and so it is not possible for the Catholic Church to participate in a congress like the one proposed. However, His Holiness wishes under no circumstances to disapprove the congress in question for those who are not united with the See of Peter."[7]

---

[6] Letter of 19 June 1918; text in M. Pribilla, Um kirchliche Einheit, 319.

[7] R. Rouse, S. C. Neill, Geschichte der Ökumenischen Bewegung 1517–1948 II (Göttigen 1958), 16.

The lively interest of Pius XI in movements for unity applied especially to Orthodoxy. As a scholar, an apostolate of the spirit was in first place in his eyes. For this he in 1922 established the Oriental Institute at Rome and required also an intensive study of the theology and liturgy of the Eastern Churches. Here he saw a special task for the Benedictines. In addition to the abbey of Niederaltaich on the Danube, this call was heard by the priory founded at Amay-sur-Meuse in 1925 and transferred to Chevetogne, Belgium, in 1939. It celebrated the liturgy in Eastern rites, cultivated the theology and spirituality of the East, and published the periodical Irénicon. In the Pope's view it is . . ."necessary for reunion especially that people know and love one another. . . . The separated parts of a gold-bearing rock are likewise gold-bearing."[8]

This could have been used of relations with Protestants. Accordingly, in an address in the consistory of 24 March 1924, Pius XI asked for ecumenical efforts in regard to all separated Christians: "We will be obliged to all Catholics who strive, under the impulse of divine grace, to facilitate admittance to the true faith for their separated brothers, whoever these may be, by dispelling their prejudices, keeping in view unadulterated Catholic teaching, and especially making evident in themselves the feature of disciples of Christ, for there is love."[9] In practice, however, the Pope occupied a rather reserved attitude in regard to Protestant ecumenism: in his view, that of historian and scholar, everything remained too much on the surface, that is, he missed the basic study of the sources, especially of the Church Fathers; as a churchman, he saw the danger of relativism and indifferentism. For some Catholics and many Protestants, especially for the participants in the conferences of Stockholm and Lausanne, it was a keen disappointment that the Catholic Church was absent. Archbishop Söderblom and with him others went so far as to conclude from this conduct that Rome thereby showed to the whole world its sectarian spirit and placed itself outside the totality of Christianity.

After Lausanne, Pius XI in the encyclical Mortalium animos of 6 January 1928 subjected the ecumenical movement, as it had thus far developed, to a sharp criticism: "Can we endure . . . that the truth, in fact the truth revealed by God, be made the object of negotiations?"[10] In the Pope's view the Catholic Church took an interest in the ecumenical movement only so far as this meant a return to the sources of faith, to the Gospel and tradition.

---

[8] G. H. Tavard, Geschichte der Ökumenischen Bewegung (Mainz 1948), 120.

[9] AAS 16(1924), 123f.

[10] Ökumenische Dokumente, ed. by H. L. Althaus (Göttingen 1962), 168f.

Despite the official refusal, private observers were present, with papal and episcopal approval, at the World Conference for Life and Work in Stockholm in 1925 and at that for Faith and Order in Lausanne in 1927: from Germany Max Joseph Metzger (1887–1944) and Hermann Hoffmann (1878–1973). It can be said that in Germany the situation was in some respects favorable for the meeting of the denominations: Here the number of "denominations" was not so large as, for example, in the United States, and in the great Churches of the nation one had to deal with partners in dialogue who were to some extent committed to a creed. At the universities were Catholic and Protestant theological faculties which with the aid of the historicocritical method demolished some prejudices and exposed common foundations. The history of the Reformation and the life and work of Martin Luther were, especially after the appearance in 1939 of the Reformation in Deutschland by Joseph Lortz (1887–1975), presented more objectively and with more understanding of its religious motives, and the Catholic share in the guilt for the schism was candidly admitted. The threat to the Churches and to Christianity from National Socialism contributed substantially to the rapprochement of the denominations. Now what was important, beyond all differences, was to save the Christian substance. It worked in favor of the cooperation of the denominations that Protestantism, as "Confessing Church," thought better of its being as Church.

Among the pioneers of Catholic ecumenism in Germany were Arnold Rademacher (1873–1939), Max Pribilla (1874–1956), Robert Grosche (1888–1967), the founder of the periodical Catholica (1932), Matthias Laros (1882–1962), Joseph Lortz, Karl Adam (1876–1966), and Max Joseph Metzger. In 1938 the last named founded the brotherhood Una Sancta, with the aim of working for unity through prayer and fraternal meetings. Due to his initiative there took place larger meetings at Meitingen near Augsburg in 1939–40. Suspected by Nazi officials as an apostle of peace, spied on and often imprisoned, Metzger was executed on 17 April 1944.

In France ecumenical thought was roused by Paul Couturier (1881–1953), who spread and spiritually deepened the World Octave of Prayer for the Unity of Christians from 18 to 25 January, which had been suggested by Anglicans, and by M. Yves Congar, O.P. (born 1904). There was to be prayer for "the unity of all Christians, as Christ desired."

After the Second World War there arose in many places Una Sancta circles of lay persons and theologians as sites of productive encounter of Catholics and Protestants in prayer and discussion. Their spontaneity naturally declined, the clearer it became how long and difficult was the road to unity. The monitum Cum compertum of the Holy Office at Rome, issued on 5 June 1948 before the first plenary assembly of the World Council at Amsterdam, seemed to produce a setback. In it was inculcated, with reference to the regulations of canon law (Canon 1325, par. 3), that participation in discussions of faith with non-Catholics was allowed only with the previous permission of the Holy See. More positive in tone were the directives for its implementation in the instruction De motione oecumenica of 20 December 1949. In it the bishops were requested not only to bestow their attention on strivings for unity but to foster and direct them. Meetings and discussions with non-Catholics were regarded as a desired opportunity to make known to non-Catholics a knowledge of Catholic teaching. To the bishops was given for three years the faculty of granting the necessary permission of the Holy See for participation in ecumenical dialogues. "The very important work of reuniting all Christians in the one true faith and in the one true Church," so the instruction concluded, "must more and more become one of the preferred functions of all pastoral care and a chief concern of the urgent prayer of all believers to God."[11]

After the Second World War the discussions of theologians received a strong stimulus. At the initiative of the archbishop of Paderborn, Lorenz Jaeger (1892–1975), and of the Lutheran bishop of Oldenburg, Wilhelm Stählin (1883–1975), theologians of both denominations met annually in Germany since 1946 to discuss common and separating doctrines. With the decisive participation of the Dutch professor of theology, Jan Willebrands (b. 1909), there was formed in 1952 the International Conference for Ecumenical Questions, whose work was incorporated into the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity established in 1960 by Pope John XXIII and directed by Cardinal Augustin Bea (1881–1968). In 1962 it obtained the official status of a conciliar commission and as such was able authoritatively to prepare the Decree on Ecumenism of the Second Vatican Council (see above, Chapter 4).

The council was to introduce a new epoch of the Ecumenical Movement within the Catholic Church. It professed ecumenism as a movement produced by the spirit, which is the task "of the whole Church, of the faithful as well as of the shepherds" (ARTICLE 5). It must be supported by the spirit of penance and inner renewal. The Catholic Church knows that it shares in the guilt for the split and it is aware that it has not always properly preached the truths of faith entrusted to it, so that it became difficult for people to find the truth. Thus it sees itself summoned to a "lasting reformation" (ART. 6). But if one can have access "only through the Catholic Church of Christ, which is the common means of salvation, to the entire fullness of the means of salvation," (ART. 3), there are still "many important elements or goods by all of which the Church is built up and acquires its life, even outside the visible limits of the Catholic Church" (ART. 3). The Holy Spirit uses the separated Churches and communities as "means of salvation." Catholics are asked "joyfully to acknowledge and highly to esteem the really Christian goods from the common heritage which are found among the separated brethren" (ART. 4).

---

[11] AAS 42(1950), 146f.

Of course, the differences still existing despite all that was common could not be concealed. "Nothing is so alien to the ecumenical spirit as false irenicism." Doctrinal differences that cause separation had to deal especially with the nature of the Church and with its power, its office. Because of the absence of the sacrament of orders, Protestants have "not preserved the original and complete reality of the Eucharistic mystery" (ART. 22). Hence "the doctrine of the Lord's Supper . . . and of the ministerial offices of the Church [are especially] necessarily the subject of the dialogue" (ART. 22). This discussion is carried on in the field of tension of the common and the separating. But one must not rest content with dialogue. The council called to common prayer. In it the grace of unity must be asked for, but the community persisting despite the split must be attested. Further, the separated brothers must work together in service to the world. This practical work is possible, even if persons are of different views in the questions of principles of morals and of the relationship of Church and society. Without prejudice to some criticism—it was especially objected that in the decree the Catholic Church saw itself as the center around which the other Churches stood more or less close, like concentric circles—the decree was generally praised; it "opened new doors for ecumenical contacts."[12]

To implement the conciliar decree the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity at Rome published guidelines for practical collaboration and dialogue with the non-Catholic Churches in 1967 and 1970 in the Ecumenical Directory. If ecumenism is an affair not only of church leadership but of all Christians, then it is important to activate "ecumenism on the spot," that is, to bring Christians together on the level of the congregations for dialogue, prayer, and common ministry to the world. This will be aided by the Roman document on "Ecumenical Cooperation on the regional, national, and local level" of 7 July 1975. In 1973 the union of dioceses of the German Federal Republic joined the Working Community of the Christian Churches in Germany, founded in 1948 and similar to the Councils of Christians in other countries. Likewise the Catholic dioceses became members of the Working Community founded on the level of the German federal states.

---

[12] W.A. Visser 't Hooft, "Die allgemeine ökumenische Entwicklung seit 1948," Geschichte der ökumenischen Bewegung 1948–1968, ed. by H. E. Frey (Göttingen 1974), 32.

Membership of the Catholic Church in the World Council of Churches is still subject, of course, to various kinds of difficulties. On the basis of the existing charter the weight of the Catholic Church, preponderant in members, would be too heavy. A "common working group" consisting of eight representatives of the World Council and of six of the Catholic Church was set up and undertook its work at Bossey near Geneva in June 1965. This was related to all questions for which the World Council itself was competent; in the first place, it was to gain information on the possibilities of dialogue and cooperation and eliminate sources of tension. The Ecumenical Work Community for Justice, Peace, and Development (Sodepax), set up at first on a trial basis by the papal commission for development assistance, Iustitia et Pax, and by the World Council in 1968, aims to help all races, peoples, and religions in the struggle against misery and war. Since the fourth plenary assembly of the World Council at Uppsala in 1968 nine Roman Catholic theologians belong as full members to the Faith and Order commission, embracing 150 persons.

The doctrinal dialogue was and is conducted in various groups on the national and international level. Except for the dialogue in 1971 between the Roman Catholic Church, the Lutheran, and the Reformed World Union on "the theology of marriage and the problem of mixed marriages," these discussions are bilateral, that is, they are conducted by the Catholic Church with one denominational Church at a time on the international, regional, and national level. Contact talks with the Lutheran World Union (LWB) led to the establishing of the study commission "The Gospel and the Church," which held five sessions in 1967–71 and collected its "working results" in 1971 in the so-called Malta Paper.[13] No complete agreement could be reached on function and intercommunion. The dialogue was continued by the Common Lutheran-Catholic Commission, newly constituted in 1975. A document on "The Lord's Supper" is in preparation.

"The Eucharist" (1967) and "Eucharist and Office" (1970) have also been the chief themes of the Catholic-Lutheran dialogue in the United

---

[13] Evangelium—Welt—Kirche. Schlussbericht und Referate der römisch-katholisch/evangelisch-lutherischen Studienkomission 'Das Evangelium und die Kirche' 1967–1971. Auf Veranlassung des lutherischen Weltbundes und des Sekretariats für die Einheit der Christen, ed. by Harding Meyer (Frankfurt 1975); cf. H. Meyer, Luthertum und Katholizismus im Gespräch (Frankfurt 1973).

States since 1965.[14] It became clear that the way to intercommunion lay only by way of harmony in the understanding of the Eucharist and a mutual recognition of ecclesiastical offices. On the basis of the talks the participants thought they could invite their respective Churches to acknowledge the validity of the offices of the other Church and the real presence of Jesus Christ in its Eucharistic celebrations.[15] Then the commission in the United States turned to the question of the papal primacy.[16] The inner consistency of this further step was perceived: "Our earlier discussions had concentrated on the ministry of office in the local communities. Now we concentrate on the unifying and organizing function of this office for the Universal Church—on the question of how a definite form of this office, that is, the papacy, has served the unity of the Universal Church in the past and how it can serve it in the future."[17] There was a striving for a certain agreement on the necessity of a special office for the entire Church. Of course, the structure and exercise of the office had to be discussed in still more detail. The talks, which are still in progress, produced in 1974 the report "Office and Universal Church," which dealt with the primacy and not yet with the problem of infallibility.

The International Anglican-Roman Catholic Commission summoned in 1970 by the Pope and the archbishop of Canterbury, came in the so-called Windsor Statement of 1971 to an "essential agreement on the doctrine of the Eucharist" and in 1973 to a basic consensus on "Office and Ordination" in the "Canterbury Statement." In these, to be sure, the question of the Petrine office and of the recognition of Anglican orders was excluded and reserved for a later discussion.[18] This was taken up in 1974. In 1976 it led in Venice to the acceptance of a declaration on "Authority in the Church."[19] In connection with authority in questions of faith for the koinonia of local Churches there were also taken up the primacy of the Bishop of Rome and his special responsibility for faith and doctrine of the Universal Church. There was demanded an appropriate balance between the primatial, collegial, and synodal exercise of authority, but recognition of a special position of the Bishop of Rome in a reunited Church as a service to its unity and catholicity was underscored. "The only episcopal see which claims a universal primacy, which has also exercised and still exercises such an episcope, is the episcopal see of Rome, the city where Peter and Paul died. It seems fit that in any coming unity a universal primacy, such as we have described it, be exercised by this episcopal see."[20] [14] G. Gassmann, M. Lienhard, M. Meyer, H. V. Herntrich, eds., Um Amt und Herrenmahl. Dokumente zum evangelisch/römisch-katholischen Gespräch. Ök. Dokumentation I (Frankfurt 1974), 55–102.

---

[15] Ibid., 88 and 99f.

[16] Report and working papers in H. Stirnimann, L. Vischer et al., Papsttum und Petrusdienst (Ök. Perspektiven 7) (Frankfurt 1975).

[17] Ibid., 93f.

[18] G. Gassmann, M. Lienhard, H. Meyer eds., Vom Dialog zur Gemeinschaft. Dokumente zum anglikanisch-lutherischen und anglikanisch-katholischen Gespräch. Ök. Dokumentation II (Frankfurt 1975), 129–48; HK 28(1974), 93–97.

[19] Text in HK 31(1977), 191–95.

Discussions with the Methodist World Union have shown remarkable agreement in the sphere of spirituality and piety. As a result, the Dialogue Commission of the United Methodist Churches and of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States published in January 1976 a statement "Holiness and Spirituality of Ecclesiastical Office."

The positive development of the relations of the Roman Catholic Church and the World Council of Churches found expression in the visit of Paul VI to the central office of the World Council at Geneva on 10 June 1969. But at the same time it became clear that the expectations expressed at Uppsala in 1968 of an imminent membership of Rome in the World Council prejudiced the development. "With all fraternal candor it is said: We are not of the opinion that the question of membership of the Catholic Church in the World Council is ready to the extent that one can or must give a positive answer to it"[21] (Paul VI).

---

[20] Ibid., 194.

[21] H. Krüger, ed., Ökumenische Bewegung 1969–1972, Beiheft z. Ök. Rundschau no. 28(Stuttgart 1975), 140.

CHAPTER 16

*The Dissident Eastern Churches

By "Eastern Churches"[1] are designated those Christian communities which were established within and outside the eastern half of the Roman Empire or, respectively, sprang from these as daughter Churches. Intellectual-historical and political influences contributed to a multiform development, which produced many foreign Churches in the twentieth century. The emigration of well-known theologians and philosophers of religion from Russia in 1917, the erecting of Orthodox theological educational institutions in the West,[2] the admittance of almost all Eastern Churches into the World Council of Churches, and their participation in its meetings and committee sessions have substantially contributed to a mutual understanding of Eastern and Western Christianity. The sympathy of the free world during persecutions of Christians in the Communist power sphere, the Sovietizing of eastern Central Europe, the atheistic religious policy of the socialist states of the Eastern bloc, which controlled all religious statements through state ecclesiastical officials and restricted them to the liturgical field, and discussions of human rights have kept alive the interest in the fate of the Eastern Churches. The tensions between Islam and Christianity, power-political confrontations in the Middle East, and restrictions on ecclesiastical life in Arabic-speaking states have caused the ecclesiastical history of the time to focus attention on the Eastern Churches.

---

* Bernhard Stasiewski

[1] J. Chrysostomus, Ostkirche, 256f.

[2] For example, at Paris (Saint Sergius Institute for Orthodox Theology), Jordanville (Holy Trinity Monastery and Seminary of the Russian Orthodox Foreign Church), and Chambésy, cf. D. Papandreou, "Das Orthodoxe Zentrum des Ökumenischen Patriarchates in Chambésy bei Genf. Entstehung, Aktivitäten, Perspektiven," Internationale Katholische Zeitschrift 4(1975), 323–30.

Here the diversity of Eastern Christianity can be presented, not in the form of reports by countries, which would have to extend to all five continents,[3] but only in survey: it includes in the order of their origin the Orthodox Churches with the four ancient patriarchates, the Church of Georgia, the patriarchates appearing in medieval and modern times, and the remaining autocephalous or autonomous Orthodox Churches,[4] as well as the Eastern, pre-Chalcedonian, and National Churches of the Nestorians and the Monophysites.

The Orthodox Churches

From the Byzantine Imperial Church proceeded the Slavonic missions which gained Bulgarians, Serbs, Rumanians, and Russians for Orthodox Christianity. In addition to the patriarch of Constantinople, the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Georgia consolidated Orthodoxy in Egypt and the Middle East and spread it into inner Asia. The daughter Churches of the ecumenical patriarchate preserved the heritage in the area of the Eastern Slavs, the Balkan Slavs, Rumania, and Greece. After the collapse of Turkish domination in southeastern Europe several Orthodox peoples obtained political independence and ecclesiastical autonomy, so that new autocephalous territorial Churches developed.

THE FOUR ANCIENT PATRIARCHATES

While the ecumenical patriarchate of Constantinople lost its eparchies in Asia Minor as a result of the Turkish-Greek war of 1922–23 and had to struggle with Turkey for its existence, it still gained authority by the voluntary subordination of Churches[5] that developed between the two world wars and afterwards. Within the totality of Orthodoxy and beyond, it was increasingly recognized as the spiritual center.

---

[3] Cf. the survey in Oriente Cattolico, op. cit., 466–88.

[4] For the autocephalous (independent) and autonomous (half-independent) Churches which are generally recognized within Orthodoxy, and the Orthodox communities whose canonicity is partly disputed, cf. J. Madey, Die Kirchen des Osten, 18f.

It owed this strengthening above all to the personality of Patriarch Athenagoras (1948–72).[6] After his election he paid special importance to the bringing together of all the Orthodox and he had as his long-range goal the unity of all Christian Churches. His initiatives for the implementation of the first three Pan-Orthodox conferences on Rhodes,[7] which were followed by a Pan-Orthodox Council, his meeting with Pope Paul VI in Jerusalem in 1964, his sharing in the common declaration,[8] proclaimed simultaneously on 7 December 1965 at Saint Peter's in Rome during the ninth public assembly of the Second Vatican Council and at Saint George's Church in the Phanar, the patriarch's residence, whereby the mutual excommunications of the Western and Byzantine heads of the Churches in 1054 were to be erased from the memory of the Churches, his visit to Pope Paul VI in Rome at the end of October 1967, to the World Council of Churches in Geneva at the beginning of November 1967, and to Western and Eastern church leaders, make clear the extent of his ecumenical efforts. He constantly stood for the improvement of pastoral care and the formation of the clergy. When the Greek Orthodox Theological University at Chalkis on the Isle of Princes, Heybeli, near Istanbul, at which also students from the patriarchates of Antioch and Alexandria and the Monophysite Church of Ethiopia studied, was closed in 1971 by the Turkish educational officials in the course of the secularization of private universities—only the "Little Seminary for Priests" could continue its teaching activities for students from Turkish territory—he exerted himself for a genuine ascetical, spiritual, and scholarly education at other places, for example, on the island of Crete. He was able to acquire a worldwide esteem once again for the ecumenical patriarchate.

His successor, Demetrios I, elected by the twelve metropolitans of the Permanent Synod, after 1972 continued the dialogue on the love of neighbor with the Christian Churches in an effort to move closer to Pan-Orthodox unity and through it the unity of all Christianity. Even if the extent of the direct jurisdiction of the patriarchate of Constantinople was further curtailed by schisms in the twentieth century and the tensions with the archbishop of Greece over a group of eparchies were not relieved, still it embraced ca. 1.5 to 2 million faithful[9] in Turkey, on the Greek islands, on Mount Athos, and in many foreign eparchies. In 1903 there were 7,432 monks in the monasteries on Athos.[10] Despite the measures of support from the patriarchs of Constantinople and other Orthodox Churches, their number had meanwhile declined to ca. 1,100.[11] The struggle over the acceptance of new monks from the Churches in the Communist sphere of power, the closing of the Athonias university, which had existed from 1749 to 1940 and from 1953 to 1971, injured the community of the twenty monasteries of the monastic republic, which, as an outstanding center of Orthodoxy, could in 1963 look back on a millennium of spiritual radiation.

---

[5] For example, the Orthodox Churches in Finland and Estonia, parts of Czechoslovak Orthodoxy, and the Paris metropolitanate of the Russian Foreign Church.

[6] B. Ohse, Der Patriarch Athenagoras I., ein ökumenischer Visionär (Göttingen and Regensburg 1968); V. Gheorghiu, La vie du patriarche Athénagoras (Paris 1969); R. Stupperich, "Athenagoras I. Ökumenischer Patriarch von Konstantinopel. Ein Nachruf," Kirche im Osten 6(1973), 11–19.

[7] 24 September to 1 October 1961, 26–28 September 1963, 1–5 November 1964.

[8] C. Patock, H. Tretter, "Zur Aufhebung des Bannes vom Jahre 1054," OstkSt 15(1966), 196–209; Tomos agapis. Vatican-Phanar 1958–1970 (Rome and Istanbul 1971), 278–97; J. Ratzinger, "Das Ende der Bannflüche von 1054. Folgen für Rom und die Ostkirchen," Internationale Katholische Zeitschrift 3(1974), 289–303.

In rank the patriarchate of Alexandria stands in second place within Orthodoxy. In comparison to the Monophysite Coptic Church with ca. 3 million faithful, its 100,000 members in Egypt have no easy position. The number of Greeks dropped because of emigration in the course of the twentieth century. Patriarch Nicholas V (1936–39) sought by means of a new law on the election of the patriarch to consolidate the predominance of the Greek clergy. His successor, Christopher II (1939–66), conceded to the synod of his Church only limited functions, and despite its opposition he ordained several bishops to care for the Orthodox in Africa and strengthened the mission to the pagans of Kenya, Tanganyika, and Uganda. This made substantial progress since 1968 under Patriarch Nicholas VI. His accommodating of Arabic-speaking faithful, his ecumenical contacts, which led in 1970 to the founding of a common Council of Churches of the Copts, Ethiopians, Syrians, Malabar Christians, and the Greek Orthodox patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, his encouraging of its own printery for the church press, theological periodicals, and publications, and the memorial celebrations of the sixteenth centenary of the death of Saint Athanasius at Alexandria and Cairo testify to the vitality of this patriarchate.

---

[9] In these and the following statistics on individual Eastern Churches there is question of estimates, since the data in handbooks and special investigations differ greatly from one another. Cf., among others, M. Lehmann, op. cit., 24–26; M. Lacko, "Die nichtchalkedonischen orientalischen Kirchen," Atlas zur Kirchengeschichte (Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1970), 78; M. Lacko, J. Martin, "Die orthodoxen Kirchen," ibid., 80; P. Wiertz, I. Doens, "Übersicht über die Kirchen des Ostens," E.v. Ivánka, J. Tyciak, P. Wiertz, op. cit., 723–50; Oriente Cattolico, op. cit., 842f.; W. Krohl, "Verzeichnis der Autonomen Katholischen Kirchen in der Welt," Kirchliches Jahrbuch für die Alt-Katholiken in Deutschland 75 (Bonn 1976), 62–68;Jahrbuch der Orthodoxie, op. cit.

[10] Le millénaire du Mont Athos 963–1963, études et mélanges, 2 vols. (Chevetogne 1964); P. Huber, Athos. Leben, Glaube, Kunst (Zurich and Freiburg 1969); E.A. de Mendieta, Mount Athos. The Garden of the Panaghia, trans. from French by M.R. Bruce (Berlin 1972); P.M. Mylonas, "Der heilige Berg Athos," Alte Kirchen und Klöster Griechenlands. Ein Begleiter zu den byzantinischen Stätten, ed. and trans. by E. Melas (Cologne 1972), 91–119.

[11] 1928: 4,848; 1959: 1,641; 1972: 1,146.

The direction of the patriarchate of Antioch passed in 1931 with Alexander III (to 1958) from Greek to Arab hands, after the constitution of 1929 had placed at the patriarch's side a National Council constituted by four metropolitans and eight delegated laymen. The two factions struggling for predominance, one of which aimed to maintain the Greek tradition while the other was of a Syrian national orientation, counterbalanced each other. Alexander III intensified the internal and external consolidation and joined the American communities firmly to his patriarchal association, and in this Exarch Anton Baschir was of assistance. Under Theodosius VI (1958–70) a schism of a few Syrian eparchies threatened to wreck the unity of the patriarchate, which took care of approximately 350,000 faithful, but it could be eliminated by the accommodating influence of Elias IV (from 1970), elected by the Greek eparchs. He restored the dioceses in eastern Turkey, vacant since the First World War, named bishops for Saudi Arabia and Australia-New Zealand, completed the restoration of the priests' seminary Belement, and reformed the valid canon law, in which, among other things, definite requirements for candidates for the episcopacy and an extensive representation of the laity on the diocesan and the parochial levels were established.

The patriarchate of Jerusalem, with ca. 70,000 faithful, is "today no more than a noble relic."[12] Patriarch Damianos (1897–1931) settled the difficulties between the Greek minority and the Arabic majority in his Church. Under Patriarch Timotheos (1935–55) the number of Greeks declined through emigration. In consequence of the political tensions in the Holy Land, the end of the British mandate in 1948, the partition of Palestine, and the proclamation of the State of Israel, the Patriarchal Church was split between Israel and Jordan. During the celebration of the fifteenth centenary of the Council of Chalcedon in 1951 the schism between the Arabs, who constituted almost 99 percent of the faithful, and the Greeks could be healed to a degree. Patriarch Benedict I (from 1957) controlled the difficulties by skillful negotiations with Jordan and Saudi Arabia, by a new constitution for the members of the Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulchre and the founding of a school for its recruits, with a Greek and an Arab section. He undertook foreign journeys to Orthodox Church leaders and asked aid for his Church, compressed in Jordan and Israel, which suffered from the consequences of Israel's two wars of 1956 and 1967. He made ecumenical contacts, for example, with Pope Paul VI in 1964, and opened an ecumenical institute for higher theological studies on the Tantur Hill between Jerusalem and Bethlehem.

---

[12] K. Onasch, op. cit., 76.

The autonomous Monastery of Saint Catherine on Mount Sinai[13] celebrated the fourteenth centenary of its existence in 1966. Since, because of Israel's June War of 1967, it was cut off from connection with its archbishop residing in Cairo, it subjected itself in 1968 to the jurisdiction of the patriarchate of Jerusalem, with which it had been united for centuries.

THE ORTHODOX CHURCH IN GEORGIA

The Georgian Orthodox ecclesiastical community in the Caucasus, issuing from the Patriarchal Church of Antioch, had been subjected to a Russian exarch in 1817, but in 1917 it declared its independence and restored its Catholicate. After the incorporation of Georgia as the Transcaucasian Soviet Socialist Republic (1922–37, since 1937 the Soviet Socialist Republic of Georgia) into the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the faithful suffered under the pressure of antireligious propaganda. Their Catholicos Ambrose (1921–22) complained in a letter to the World Economic Conference of Genoa in 1922 of the atrocities of the Bolsheviks; with all the higher dignitaries of the Church, he was arrested and died in prison in 1927. Under Catholicos Kallistratos (1932–52) ecclesiastical communion was in 1943 again restored with the patriarchate of Moscow and a certain freedom of movement was made possible to the Georgian Church. It was preserved because of the collaboration of Catholicos Melchisedek III (1952–60) and especially of his successor, Ephraem II (1960–72), with the Patriarchal Church of Moscow, and their declarations of loyalty to the regime. Catholicos David V tried to fill his fifteen eparchies, of which several were vacant when he took office, with suitable persons and to consolidate the Georgian Church, with its from 750,000 to 1 million faithful and four monasteries. Disagreements between the patriarchal leadership and the priesthood, internal repression of the Church by [13] H.L. Rabino, Le monastère de Sainte-Cathérine du Mont Sinai (Cairo 1938); H. Skrobucha, Sinai (Olten and Lausanne 1959); G. Gerster, Sinai, Land der Offenbarung (Berlin 1961); M.B. Schlink, Sinai Heute. Stätten der Gottesoffenbarung zwischen Nil und Moseberg, 3d ed. (Darmstadt and Eberstadt 1975).

---

Communist officials, and police actions against the youth impaired ecclesiastical life.

THE PATRIARCHATES ORIGINATING IN THE MIDDLE AGES AND IN MODERN TIMES

The Bulgarian Orthodox Church[14] already had its own patriarchate in the Middle Ages, but lost it in the period of Turkish domination. When in 1870 it established an autonomous exarchate, the result was schism between Sofia and Constantinople. After the death of the exarch Joseph (1877–1915) the state did not permit a new election, and until 1945 the Church was administered by the Holy Synod. A synod convoked by the government in 1921 outlined a reform program, but it could not be realized. An assembly of the bishops, which in 1927 dealt with, among other things, problems of religious instruction and education, saw to the completing of the academy founded at Sofia in 1923, the formation of the clergy, and the ecclesiastical cooperative system. After Bulgaria had been declared a people's republic in 1946, religious instruction in the public schools was abolished, the greatest part of the Church's landed property was confiscated, ecclesiastical social work and ecclesiastical cooperative life were impeded. The protests of Exarch Stojan (1945–48) to the government, his efforts for the imparting of religious instruction in Sunday schools, and his defense of the Christian faith in newspapers and pamphlets led to his removal by the Holy Synod, which was prepared to cooperate with the regime. The new constitution of 1947, with appendixes in 1961 and 1965, and the law on creeds of 1949 completed the separation of Church and state and placed the Churches under strict state supervision. The Holy Synod and the administrators of the exarchate, especially Cyril (1951–53), urged the reestablishment of the Orthodox patriarchate of Bulgaria. A recognized church historian, preacher, and organizer, who had proved his loyalty to the regime by taking part in state organizations and national party and anniversary celebrations, he was elected patriarch in 1953 and held the office until 1970. Most Eastern Churches assented to the elevation in rank, the ecumenical patriarch only in 1961. Cyril tried to parry the state's totalitarian claim by his often scholarly publications, cooperation in the "peace movement," participation in the state celebration in honor of Cyril and Methodius in 1963, completion of the theological academy at Sofia and of the two priests' seminaries still left to the Church, continuation of an official paper and of ecclesiastical periodicals, and by his foreign journeys, on which he proved to be a promoter of ecumenism. In 1967 he succeeded in obtaining that a few monks might return to the Rila monastery, a Bulgarian national sanctuary and Marian pilgrimage place for a thousand years, which had been closed in 1961 on orders of the government, and had been declared a national memorial spot and been transformed into a tourist attraction. His successor, Maximos (since 1971), heads 6 million faithful, about two-thirds of the total population, with 1,500 priests, who are paid by the state, in 11 metropolitanates in Bulgaria and 2 foreign dioceses. The Church retains 120 monasteries, with ca. 400 monks and nuns, rural farming areas with twenty industries of its own; to it was granted a monopoly of the production and sale of candles, crosses, and devotional objects. But external security is jeopardized by the constant atheistic propaganda, which regards religion as a hindrance to social development and directs the process of overcoming religion.

---

[14] The first Bulgarian patriarchate with its seat at Achrida existed from 927 to 1018, the second at Trnovo from 1235 to 1393. In 1870 the sultan granted the constituting of an independent exarchate, which was not recognized by the patriarchate of Constantinople until 1945.

The Serbian Orthodox[15] strove after the erecting of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes in 1918—renamed the Kingdom of Yugoslavia in 1929—for the restoration of their patriarchate. In 1920 the metropolitanate of Belgrade, patriarchate-in-exile of Karlowitz, the Bosnian, Dalmatian, Macedonian, and the Montenegrin hierarchy united into a uniform Serbian Church, at whose head the metropolitan of Belgrade, Demetrios (1920–30), appeared as patriarch. It lasted almost ten years until the organization and legislation of the Orthodox patriarchate of Serbia were terminated. The tensions between the Orthodox—in 1931 48.7 percent—and the Catholics—in 1931 37.4 percent—led in 1935 to a conflict. The government wanted a concordat with the Holy See but Patriarch Barnabas (1930–37) rejected it. The occupation of Yugoslavia by Germans, Italians, and Bulgarians in 1941, the creation of an independent Croat state with a Catholic majority in the population, in which in 1942 a Croatian Orthodox Church with 1.8 million faithful was established, nationalistic conflicts and partisan struggles impeded the pastoral activity of Patriarch Gabriel V (1938–50), who was imprisoned in 1941, and of his representative, Joseph (1941–46).

Tito's seizure of power in 1944, the founding of the federated People's Republic of Yugoslavia in 1945, which expressed separation of Church and state in the constitution of 31 January 1946, and the policy of the government, which aimed to exclude the Church from public life, produced a struggle against the Church. Patriarch Gabriel V was able to prevent the union of the Serbian Church with that of Moscow, sought by the patriarchate of Moscow in 1947, and to restrain the association of Orthodox priests, called into existence the same year, which demanded the extension of the rights of the lesser clergy. Under his successor, Vikentij (1950–58), the strained relations with the government improved after the liberation of church leaders condemned in the first postwar years and the filling of vacant sees and parishes by means of the law on the legal status of ecclesiastical communities of 27 May 1953, but the seizure of church property and land, the payment of ecclesiastics and of retired persons by the state, the restrictions on the teaching activity and the number of students of the theological faculty of the University of Belgrade, which in 1952 was transformed into an academy, the support given by Tito to the efforts for independence of the Macedonian Church[16] made clear that the Patriarchal Church was only tolerated. Patriarch German, in office from 1958, tried, relying on the loyalty of broad strata of the population, to make the most of the possibilities left to him. He established theological schools, for example, in the monastery of Krka in Dalmatia in 1965, to provide for the threatening lack of priests, took care for the improvement of professional theological periodicals, and protested against the impeding of religious instruction and the restrictions on the care of souls, in which connection he appealed to the regulations of the constitution of 7 April 1963. After the abrogation of the law on religion of 1953, the individual republics issued laws for their area, which allowed more authority to the local administrative officials than hitherto. The attacks by the Communists against the ecclesiastical press, stepped up since 1972, tightening of censorship, imprisonment of priests, prohibition for youth to take part in the feast of Saint Sava (d. 1235), patron of Serbia, indicate a deterioration of the climate. The approximately reckoned 8 million faithful were cared for at the time by 26 hierarchs—1 patriarch, 2 metropolitans, 22 bishops, and 1 episcopal vicar. In addition to the 21 spheres of jurisdiction at home, there are 5 abroad. The well constructed church organization, with more than 4,000 churches, the 75 monasteries of men and 75 of women, with 350 monks and 800 nuns, and the appearance of periodicals, however, cannot conceal the fact that the Patriarchal Church suffers under the pressure of the regime.

---

[15] The Serbs had had their own patriarchate in 1351–1459 and 1557–1766, and in 1789 had maintained the autocephaly of their Church.

After the abdication of the last tsar, Nicholas II, the Orthodox Church in Russia, which after the abolition of the patriarchate of Moscow (1589–1721) experienced an epoch of state Church regime under the Holy Synod with supervision by a procurator, succeeded in restoring the Moscow patriarchate at its council in the fall of 1917. On 5

---

[16] See below, p. 491.

November 1917 the metropolitan of Moscow, Tikhon,[17] was elected patriarch. The October Revolution of 1917 and the establishing of the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic in 1918—since 1922 the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—under the dictatorship of the Bolsheviks completely changed the situation in Russia.

The decree of 19 January 1918 completed the separation of Church and state, it declared the possessions of ecclesiastical and religious communities to be the people's property. ARTICLE 13 of the constitution of 10 July 1918 firmly established this principle of separation and granted to all citizens, in addition to liberty of conscience, also the right of antireligious propaganda. The fundamental rejection of religion and the fully conscious attacks on it excluded the Patriarchal Church from public life, restricted it to the ecclesiastical sphere, and exposed hierarchs and clergy to administrative chicanery and calumnies. During the civil war between the Whites and the Reds in September 1919 Patriarch Tikhon forbade ecclesiastics to take part in the political confrontations. But his protest against the confiscation decreed by the government in February 1922 of objects of value and of worship in the churches, from the proceeds of which allegedly the growing famine was to be alleviated, was the occasion for his imprisonment from May 1922 to June 1923. The regime demanded the dissolution of the hierarchy, it expected to split and destroy the Patriarchal Church by means of the "Living Church"[18] that it supported. Because of the news of the execution and imprisoning of many bishops and priests, Tikhon decided to sign a declaration submitted to him, "that from now on I am no longer an enemy of the Soviet Union."[19] Many of the faithful withdrew again from the "Living Church," which existed until 1946. The patriarch's declaration of loyalty and his appeal to the faithful to follow him in this attitude saved the existence of the Patriarchal Church, it is true, but they changed nothing in the intentions of the regime. The three candidates designated by Tikhon (d. 1925) in his last will to take charge of the administration as his representatives after his death were imprisoned or banished. The leadership of the Church was without a patriarch for eighteen years.

---

[17] Cf. J. Chrysostomus, Kirchengeschichte Russlands der neuesten Zeit I; R. Rössler, Kirche und Revolution in Russland. Patriarch Tichon und der Sowjetstaat (Cologne 1969); J. Chrysostomus, "Gedanken zum 50. Todestag des Patriarchen Tichon von Moskau und Ganz Russland, 25. März/7. April 1925," OstkSt 24(1975), 318–32.

[18] M. B. B., "Der misslungene Versuch zur Vernichtung der Russisch-Orthodoxen Kirche in den Jahren 1922–1923 und die Niederlage des linken Kommunismus," OstkSt 22 (1973), 105–49; J. Chrysostomus, "Eine lehrreiche Episode aus der neueren Kirchengeschichte Russlands. Gedanken über den Artikel von A. Krasnov-Levitin über den 'Untergang der Erneuerungsbewegung,'" ibid., 302–15.

[19] J. Chrysostomus, Kirchengeschichte Russlands der neuesten Zeit I, 373.

Metropolitan Sergius—deputy patriarchal administrator from 1925 to 1937, patriarchal administrator from 1937 to 1941, and patriarch from 1943 to 1944—was also imprisoned. Because of the intensified persecution of the Church, the appearance of the League of the Militant Atheists, which in 1932 had more than 5 million members, and the threat of further anti-Church measures, Sergius, after his release in March 1927, accommodated the government by a declaration of loyalty, to which he also bound all the faithful. Several bishops did not consent, and there developed the Church of the Catacombs, which has maintained itself until the present. Despite Sergius's subservience, the Church was without rights. The religious law of 8 April 1929 extraordinarily curtailed the possibility of effectiveness of the Churches. A law of 18 May 1929 changed ART. 13 of the constitution in the sense that only freedom of the practice of acts of worship and antireligious propaganda were guaranteed. The closing of churches and monasteries, the imprisoning and deporting of ecclesiastics, the dissolution of congregations in 1928–30 and 1935–37 pointed out the threatened status of the Patriarchal Church,[20] even if in 1937 50 million of the population—27 percent of the total—belonged to it. The occupation of the Baltic states, Bessarabia, and eastern Poland by the Soviet Union improved its situation, because the number of its priests, monasteries, and institutions was increased, but of course they were soon caught in the wake of the persecution. The outbreak of the German-Soviet war on 22 June 1941 produced an unanticipated turn: Sergius called for prayer services, and church collections yielded more than 300 million rubles for armaments. The administration of the patriarchate published a cooperative volume,[21] in which the persecutions of Christians were denied and punishments were traced to political crimes. Stalin honored Sergius's procedure, received him on 4 September 1943, and let him be elected patriarch by nineteen hierarchs on 8 September. On 23 September a sort of concordat came into existence, according to which the Church could establish two ecclesiastical academies and eight seminaries for priests. The state Department of Churches for the Affairs of the Orthodox Church,[22] which took up its activity on 10 October 1943, was supposed to foster further normalization and supervise the exact observance of the pertinent governmental directives.

---

[20] While the Orthodox Church in Russia on the eve of the First World War counted over 54,174 churches, 51,105 priests, 350 monasteries of men, and 473 monasteries of women, there were in the Patriarchal Church of Moscow in 1939 only 5,225 churches, 5,665 priests, and 37 monasteries.

[21] Die Wahrheit in Russland (Moscow 1942).

[22] In 1943–60 it was directed by C. G. Karpov; his successor is W. A. Kurojedev. They continued the supervisory office of the Procurator of the Holy Synod in tsarist Russia.

The metropolitan of Leningrad, Alexis,[23] became Sergius's successor. As three-time bearer of the Order of the Red Workers' Banner and recipient of the medal for the defense of Leningrad, he cooperated intimately with the government. He was elected patriarch (1945–70) in February 1945 at a council in Moscow in which forty-six bishops took part. The church statute adopted even before his election by this assembly strengthened the centralization of ecclesiastical administration. The accommodating attitude of the regime must be referred to the support which Alexis gave it in foreign and domestic policy, for example, in the dissolution of the Uniate Church in the Ukraine and Podcarpathia in 1946–50, the entering into relations with other Orthodox Churches, and his championing of the Soviet peace ideology. Until the death in 1953 of Stalin, to whom the patriarch dedicated a pious work of condolence, and in the years of de-Stalinization the Orthodox Church was able to develop within the limits set for it by the state. Through the releasing of ecclesiastics from concentration camps, the restoration of confiscated churches, the reconstruction of the hierarchy, the formation of clerics in seminaries and by correspondence courses, several propaganda journeys of the patriarch outside the country, and the strengthening of the activity of the ecclesiastical foreign office, which strove for influence on Orthodox emigrant Churches, the position of the Patriarchal Church was stabilized within and outside the Soviet Union. The Žurnal Moskovskoj Patriarchii,[24] appearing since the end of the Second World War, supplied the clergy with valuable information and stimulation through its contributions on church history and dogmatic and pastoral theology and its comprehensive news on the life of Orthodoxy and of the ecumenical movement. At the Ecclesiastical Academy in the Monastery of the Holy Trinity at Sagorsk near Moscow and in Leningrad there was given a qualified theological education. But this inner consolidation was endangered by the Pan Union Society founded in 1947 for the dissemination of political and scientific knowledge, which renewed militant atheism through publications and meetings, and the decree of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on 10 November 1954 on the failures in the implementation of scientific-atheistic propaganda among the population. Under Khruschev, who was secretary general of the Central Committee from 1953, and minister president from 1958 to

---

[23] J. Müller, Patriarch Alexius (Berlin 1967); G. Seide, "In Memoriam. Zum Tod des Hochheiligen Patriarchen von Moskau und ganz Russland am 17. April 1970," Kyrios, n.s., 10 (1970), 130–48.

[24] R. Rössler, "Das Journal des Moskauer Patriarchats als Spiegel kirchlicher Entwicklung in der Sowjetunion (seit dem Zweiten Weltkrieg)," Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, n.s., 4 (1956), 26–63.

1964, and who died in 1971, there began a new persecution of the Churches. From 1959 to 1964, in addition to systematic campaigns of defamation, there were trials of higher and lower clerics, who were burdened with fines for crimes, the closing of ca. 10,000 churches out of 20,000, 50 monasteries out of 68, and 5 seminaries out of 8. The protests of the patriarch and the remonstrances of the ecclesiastical opposition against administrative measures of local officials, which was written down underground in the Samizdat literature,[25] had as a consequence that the state Department of Churches under Kurojedev sharpened the restrictions against the Church, Metropolitan Nikoly, who had directed the Church's foreign office since 1944 and was among the closest co-workers of Alexis, was replaced by Bishop Nikodim, and the Council of Ministers of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in 1961 forced the changing of ART. 4 of the status of the Church approved in 1945, whereby the administration of the congregations was withdrawn from the parish priests. Nikodim, since 1963 metropolitan of Leningrad and Novgorod, quickly gained influence in the Holy Synod and tried to preserve the interests of Russian Orthodoxy by elastic negotiations with the state Department of Churches and his positive relationship to the World Council of Churches[26] and to the Roman Catholic Church.[27] When in 1970 Patriarch Alexis died at the age of ninety-three, he was regarded as one of those with the best prospects of succeeding him.

At the council in Moscow in 1971 the patriarchal representative Pimen was elected patriarch by acclamation. He continued the policy of his predecessor in order not to endanger the minimum of existence assured to the Church by the state. His support of the Communist World Peace Movement, his many journeys to foreign countries, on which he tried to unite the Orthodox Churches in the People's republics, the Middle East, and the free world closer to himself, his emphasized concern for Orthodox tradition and liturgy, his assurance that normal relations existed between Church and state in the Soviet Union, were unable to mask the danger to the Orthodox faith. The defamation of religious feasts, which were said to be based on imagined events and myths and which were replaced by Socialist celebrations, the intensifying of the antireligious propaganda, which was seen in the tightening of ideological instruction in adult education programs, at universities, in the army, and in the efforts of 10,000 functionaries of atheism, the government's methods of suppression, which, among other things, represented the religious education of children as assault, the sending of believers to psychiatric clinics, and protests of citizens' rights groups, which stood up for human rights and religious liberty, made clear that the Patriarchal Church could not freely develop. The religious law enacted in June 1975[28] codified the guidelines, long expressed in secret instructions, of the Soviet state-Church, further blocked off the living space of the Churches, manipulated the life of congregations, and intensified the competition of the state's offices of supervision. About 30 million faithful—12 percent of the total population—are aware of their difficult situation and endure the restrictions imposed on them. The possibility of action of bishops and priests is curtailed, but the overwhelming majority of the clergy[29] strive as far as possible to proclaim the Gospel and celebrate the liturgy and demonstrate the unbroken will to live of the Patriarchal Church. In addition to 45 dioceses—10 metropolitans, 12 archbishops, and 25 bishops—in the Soviet Union, there belong to it the Ukrainian exarchate with 14 dioceses—2 metropolitans, 8 archbishops, and 4 bishops—the exarchates in Western Europe—in addition to Exarch Nikodim, 1 metropolitan, 1 archbishop, and 2 bishops—Central Europe—1 metropolitan and 2 archbishops—and Central and South America—5 bishops.

---

[25] Die hektographierten "Selbstveröffentlichungen": Samizdat, Cronaca di una vita nuova nell'URSS (Milan 1974); R. Medwedjew, ed., Aufzeichnungen aus dem sowjetischen Untergrund. Texte aus der Moskauer Samisdat-Zeitschrift "Das XX. Jahrhundert" (Hamburg 1977).

[26] In 1961 the Moscow patriarchate was admitted to the World Council of Churches, which it had earlier opposed in polemics.

[27] Nikodim, by his exertions for the ending of the conflict between the Patriarchal Church and the Old Believers separated from it (Raskolniki), brought about at the Moscow National Council in 1971 the annulment of the excommunication pronounced on them in 1666. In 1971 he gave up the direction of the Office for Foreign Affairs, which Metropolitan Juvenalij assumed. Nikodim became chairman of the office for relations among the Orthodox sister Churches and other Christian Churches and communities. In the same year he became secretary general of the Christian Peace Movement. In 1974 he obtained the exarchate for Western Europe. In July 1975 Pope Paul VI received him with the delegation headed by him from the Moscow patriarchate. In December 1975 the fifth plenary assembly of the World Council elected him as its president.

The Rumanian patriarchate arose after the First World War through the merger of the Rumanian national Church with the Churches of [28] G. Simon, "Verhärtung durch Festschreibung. Zum neuen Religionsgesetz in der Sowjetunion," HK 30 (1976), 263–301; idem, Das sowjetische Religionsgesetz vom Juni 1975 (Cologne 1976).

---

[29] But cf. J. Chrysostomus, Die Problematik der heutigen russischen Kirche, 213: "There is still another difficulty: it is quite possible, even likely, that the government will infiltrate its people, that is, those who serve the state rather than the Church, into the ranks of the clergy. The faithful are annoyed and made insecure by these facts, hence they occasionally condemn the entire hierarchy which tolerates this. But what can the hierarchy of an imprisoned Church undertake against this if it does not want to lose the last supports of church life in Russia? Therein really lies today the balance in the question of the problem of the Moscow patriarchate and its entire tragedy."

Karlowitz, Sibin, and Czernowitz.[30] The difficulties which ensued in the Kingdom, almost doubled in size by the union of various territories, were noticeable also in the ecclesiastical sphere. The constitution of 1923 declared Orthodoxy the prevailing Church and decreed a uniform organization with five metropolitanates. It was realized by a law and the statute of the Rumanian Orthodox Church of 1925. Its synod proposed the elevation of the metropolitan see of Bucharest to the rank of a patriarchate, and the establishment took place on 27 February 1925. On 27 September Miron, metropolitan of Bucharest, was solemnly enthroned as first patriarch (1925–39) with the assent of the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople. From 1927 to 1930 he belonged to the government's Council of Three and in the last years of his life he took over the post of minister president. Through his participation in the forming of a uniform canon law, the assimilation of the varied structures of the metropolitanates subordinate to him, his championship of a basic study of theology and his openness to the ecumenical movement, he deserved well of his country. He was succeeded by the metropolitan of Moldavia, Nikodim (1939–48), who as abbot and bishop had worked for the renewal of Rumanian monasticism. The Second World War, in which Rumania had to cede frontier areas, recovered parts, in 1944 was occupied by Soviet troops, the Communist regime since 1945, and the proclamation of the People's Republic of Rumania in 1947 impeded the carrying out of planned reforms. Nikodim urged the faithful to cooperate in the reconstruction of the state.

As his successor was elected Justinian (1948–77), metropolitan of Moldavia. As a versatile diplomat, a purposeful ecclesiastical politician, and man of confidence of the regime,[31] he approved the coexistence between the Orthodox Church and the Communist state leadership. In the church statute of 1948 he was able to extend his competence, even if the synod came under state supervision. In 1948 he played a decisive role in the forcible union of 1.5 million Uniate Rumanians with the Orthodox Church. He strengthened the patriarchate by directives to the clergy on a social apostolate suited to the changed circumstances, reform of monasticism, rules for preaching, building of the ecclesiastical press, and deepening of theological formation. Of course, he had also to submit to serious interventions in church life. The suppression of the Ministry of Worship in 1957 and the subordination of the Church to the Department of Worship introduced, with a continuous bombardment of atheistic propaganda and the spread of calumnies, a persecution of the Church, in which many monasteries were closed and many monks and nuns were arrested.[32] Temporarily, the patriarch was under house arrest. Nevertheless, he held to his reform program. In 1966 the Department of Worship approved a new regulation for theological studies, and in 1967 a modification of the church statute, which made possible the completion of the hierarchy. If from 1970 on the state's influencing of the synod was extended, and in 1974 a law decreed the secularization of all articles of art still in the possession of the churches and in private ownership, the patriarch's self-assurance remained unbroken. Justinian's cooperation in the Communist Peace Movement, in Pan-Orthodox conferences, and in the World Council of Churches, and his visits to foreign Orthodox and Catholic Church leaders consolidated his general esteem. On the occasion of its fiftieth jubilee celebration in 1975 more than 14 million faithful belonged to the Patriarchal Church. Its hierarchy consisted of 4 metropolitanates in Rumania, with 2 archbishops, 6 bishops, and 8 episcopal vicars and of 3 foreign areas of jurisdiction,[33] with 1 archbishop, 1 bishop, and 1 episcopal vicar. Two theological institutes and 7 seminaries care for the recruits of the clergy, numbering ca. 9,000. Several periodicals are published by the patriarchal administration and individual dioceses. Justinian's loyalty contributed to this, that the Orthodox Church in Rumania, in comparison to the other countries under Communist rule, has to some extent preserved its previous situation. In June 1977 Justin, former metropolitan of Moldavia, took up his legacy as fourth Rumanian patriarch.

---

[30] Cf. E. C. Suttner, 50 Jahre rumänisches Patriarchat (1975), 136–60.

[31] Justinian had personal relations with the Communist party leader, Gheorgiu Dej (1952–55) minister president, from 1955 first Secretary of the party, from 1961 chairman of the Council of State, d. 1965).

OTHER ORTHODOX CHURCHES

In the course of the centuries, especially in the last decades, a series of Churches have separated from the historically developed and already described structure of Orthodoxy and become autonomous.

In the Mediterranean Area

The Orthodox Church of Cyprus has been autocephalous since the Council of Ephesus in 431.[34] Archbishop Cyril III (1916–33) was recognized by the British occupation authorities, who in 1925 declared the island a crown colony, as ethnarch, but came into conflict with him, because he supported the national Greek unity movement, Enosis, which sought a union with Greece. An uprising that broke out in 1931 was suppressed, and two bishops and various clerics had to leave the country. From 1933 to 1947 the archbishopric was administered by the chairman of the Holy Synod, Bishop Leontios of Paphos, as administrator, who could not be elected as archbishop until 1947. Under his successors, Makarios II (1947–50) and Makarios III (1950–77),[35] the Greeks—80 percent of the total population—fought for their independence. In the disturbances of 1955–56 Makarios III and other ecclesiastics were banished. After the election of the archbishop, who had returned from exile in 1959, as president of the republic and the proclamation of Cyprus as an independent state in 1960, a certain calm ensued. In the next years Makarios III tried to revise the constitution of Cyprus of 16 August 1960, which had granted certain rights to the Turkish minority—20 percent of the total population—in favor of the Greek Cypriots. The countermeasures of the Turkish inhabitants produced struggles in 1963, which could only be ended in 1965 by the use of United Nations troops. Makarios III recognized that the union of Cyprus with Greece could not be accomplished. Murders and attempted uprisings, behind which stood the Greek military government, caused a crisis which led to war between Greece and Turkey. In the course of it, the Turks conquered the northeastern part—40 percent—of the island. Makarios had deposed three bishops at a synod in March 1973 because of the abandonment of Enosis, but in July he was confirmed at a large synod as archbishop and president of the state. The ecclesiastical organization carried out by him in 1973 for 450,000 faithful, with 1 archbishopric, 6 metropolitanates, and 650 clergy, his efforts for the building of new churches, his care for the better paying and pensioning of ecclesiastics, the transformation of the minor seminary in Nicosia into a theological faculty, his care of 11 monasteries with 89 monks and 75 nuns, and his receptiveness to the ecumenical movement characterized his concept of his pastoral office.

---

[32] Between 1959 and 1971 the number of monasteries and sketes (monastic settlements) dropped from 1,657 to 575, the number of nuns from 4,000 to 1,493, the number of priests from 10,153 to 8,564.

[33] There is question of the Rumanian Orthodox missionary diocese in the United States, the Rumanian Orthodox archdiocese of Western Europe, and the Orthodox Catholic diocese of France, which was established in 1937 and in 1972 made the motion for admission to the Rumanian patriarchate.

[34] Cf. Hippolytos, "Die Autokephale Apostolische Orthodoxe Kirche Cyperns," Ekklesia X (1941), 177–229.

As regards the number of the faithful—ca. 7 million—the Orthodox Church in Greece belonged, after the patriarchates of Moscow, Rumania, and Serbia, to the four largest Orthodox communities of the present. Only gradually were the Holy Synod and the archbishops[36] of the day able to loosen their dependence on the state's ecclesiastical domination, beginning with the church constitution of 1923, which expanded the ecclesiastical self-administration under Archbishop Chrysostom I (1923–38), through protracted confrontations because of the method of election of the archbishop and bishops and the competence of the Holy Synod, down to the church statute decreed in 1969 by the military government, but it was annulled in 1974. Archbishops Chrysanthius (1938–41) and Damaskinos (1941–49) eliminated the internal church damages which the Second World War and the civil war planned by the Communist partisans had caused. During the negotiations between state and Church on the reduction of the number of episcopal sees there occurred in 1965 a conflict in which Archbishop Chrysostom II (1962–67) was supplanted by the Archimandrite Jerome. As a university professor of canon law and practical theology, he had favored a separation of Church and state, as archbishop he authoritatively took up reform measures which his predecessors had already advised, but the opposition to his procedure and his dependence on the military regime caused his retirement in 1973. His successor, Archbishop Seraphim (from 1974), tried to bridge the gulf between his electors and Jerome's adherents and to realize the already started raising of the educational level and living standard of the clergy and the renewal of the monastic life.[37] He confronted the problems which the industrialization of Greece, the de-Christianization and the migration of the population presented to the Church. Orthodoxy is still deeply rooted among the people. The archbishopric is divided into 76 metropolitanates. Two faculties at Athens and Saloniki and 12 theological schools care for the training of the clerical recruitment, for which, however, not enough candidates apply. The brotherhood ZOË, social and charitable communities, and numerous periodicals promote church life.

---

[35] K. Kerber, Makarios Kirchenfürst oder? (Diessen/Ammersee 1964); P. N. Vanezis, Makarios. Faith and Power, 2d ed. (London, New York, and Toronto 1972).

[36] Differing from the situation among the Slavic Orthodox Churches, the archbishop of Greece is above the metropolitan.

In contrast to the Greek Church, which has the ability to develop freely, the Orthodox Church is completely suppressed in Albania. It had proclaimed its autocephaly in 1922, and in 1937 this was recognized by the ecumenical patriarch; in 1938 it numbered ca. 200,000 faithful—10 percent of the population—with 1 metropolitan, 4 bishops, 200 priests, 29 monasteries, and 2 seminaries. But after the Communist seizure of power in 1946 it, like all other religions in the People's Republic of Albania, fell into complete dependence on the regime. Archbishop Christopher (1937–49) was deposed; his two successors, Paisios (1949–66) and Damian (1966–73)—the latter died after six years in prison—could do nothing against the tight control exercised over the Church. Hoxha, secretary general of the Albanian Communist Party, in 1967 declared Albania to be the first atheistic state in the world, had all laws annulled which regulated relations between state and Church, and intensified the struggle against religious traditions. All churches were closed and turned into clubhouses, markets, and factories, the bishops[38] were imprisoned, and the ecclesiastical organization was shattered. A few priests still work underground.

---

[37] 1973: 174 monasteries of men with 798 monks, 209 monasteries of women with 2,552 nuns. Their number is retrograde.

After the Balkan wars of 1913–14 the Orthodox Macedonians were under Serb, Bulgarian, and Greek ecclesiastical authority; most of them lived in Yugoslavia. Since 1944 they have worked for the autonomy of the archbishopric of Achrida, incorporated in 1767 into the patriarchate of Constantinople. In 1958–59 Serbian Patriarch German had to assent to the declaration of autonomy of a Macedonian ecclesiastical assembly and the election of his auxiliary bishop, Dositej, as archbishop of Achrida and Macedonia. When the Orthodox Church in Macedonia, in an understanding with the state authorities, proclaimed its autocephaly, there were tensions with the Serbian mother Church. Archbishop Dositej completed the church organization with 6 metropolitanates and 1 abroad, 600,000 faithful, 300 clerics, and 1 seminary, introduced the Macedonian language into the liturgy, and made ecumenical contacts. In 1975 the Church adopted a constitution, but the development of its life was impeded by Yugoslav legislation, which intensified antireligious decrees in the Republic of Macedonia in 1976.

In connection with the self-administration of Crete at the end of the nineteenth century, the see of Gostyna became an autonomous Orthodox metropolitanate with its seat at Heraklion in 1900. From the political annexation of Crete by Greece in 1913, the Orthodox have had to observe not only the guidelines of the patriarchate of Constantinople but also those of the Greek national Church. In 1967 the Orthodox Church in Crete[39] was elevated by act of the patriarch to an archbishopric with seven metropolitanates and was granted partial autonomy, which it might develop into autocephaly. Archbishop Eugenios is responsible for 450,000 faithful, 335 priests, 34 monasteries with 187 monks and 74 nuns. The Orthodox academy on Crete developed into a center for adult education. After the closing of the patriarchal school at Chalkis,[40] the university at Heraklion, administered in common by the Greek state and the Church, assumed its functions in 1973.

---

[38] Two Albanian bishops still work in North America but only among the emigrants: Bishop Stefan subordinated the Albanian Orthodox Diocese in America directed by him with his seat in South Boston to the Orthodox Church in America in 1971. Bishop Mark, with his seat at Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts, is in union with the Greek Orthodox archdiocese of North America, which belongs to the ecumenical patriarchate.

[39] A. Alevisopoulos, "Die orthodoxe Kirche von Kreta," Wegzeichen. Festgabe zum 60. Geburtstag von Hermenegild M. Biedermann OSA, ed. by E. C. Suttner and C. Patock (Würzburg 1971), 233–44.

[40] See above, p. 475.

In East Central Europe and the Far East

The Orthodox Church in Finland[41] was until 1917–18 a component of the Russian Church; in the Finnish republic established after the First World War it was granted rights alongside the Lutheran state Church. After the patriarch of Moscow, Tikhon, had recognized its autonomy in 1918, the church leadership subjected itself to the ecumenical patriarchate, which in 1923 confirmed its autonomy. In 1939–44 the diocese of Karelia, in which were a majority of the Orthodox congregations, was incorporated into the Soviet Union. After 1945 the exertions of the patriarchate of Moscow to extend its supremacy over the Finnish Church collapsed. Archbishop Paavali, in office since 1960, with two dioceses and two monasteries subject to him, is trying to restore the ecclesiastical life of the 60,000 faithful—1.3 percent of the population—and to reduce the growing number of mixed marriages between Orthodox and Lutherans.

Between the two world wars there lived in Poland almost 4 million Orthodox—12 percent of the population—who in 1923 merged into the Orthodox Church in Poland; in 1924–25 the ecumenical patriarch assented to its declaration of autocephaly. The ecclesiastical policy of the Polish government opposed the national Ukrainian and White Russian tendencies toward the autonomy of the Orthodox population. In 1938–39, 130 churches and two monasteries were destroyed. The partition of Poland in 1939 and the German occupation of the Ukraine in 1941–44 split Polish Orthodoxy into the Church in the Gouvernement General and two Churches in the Ukraine.[42] In the areas occupied by the Soviets, the Orthodox were incorporated into the patriarchate of Moscow. Under Metropolitan Dionisij (1923–48, d. 1961), who was removed from office by the government of the People's Republic of Poland because of his collaboration with the Germans, the numbers of the Orthodox decreased to 350,000 after the cession of East Poland to the Soviet Union, but in 1948 it increased by the coming over of 100,000 Uniate Ukrainians after the forcible annulment of the Union of Brest of 1595–96. In 1948 Patriarch Alexis of Moscow possessed supreme jurisdiction over Polish Orthodoxy and in 1951 he consented to its autocephaly. Metropolitan Makarij (1951–61) created a new church organization for the Orthodox scattered through resettlement throughout Poland with the archbishopric of Warsaw-Bielsk and the three bishoprics of Bialystok-Gdansk, Lodz-Pomerania, and Wroclaw-

---

[41] T. Rohner, "Die orthodoxe Kirche Finnlands," OstkSt 12 (1963), 314–25.

[42] F. Heyer, Die orthodoxe Kirche in der Ukraine 1917 bis 1945 (Cologne-Braunsfeld 1953).

Szczecin, which was completed, with the aid of the Holy Synod, by his successors, Timoteusz (1961–62), Jerzy (1962–64), and Stefan (1964–69). Since 1970 Metropolitan Vassilij has been its head, with ca. 400,000 faithful, 225 congregations, and one monastery each for monks and nuns. The process of integration of the Russian, Ukrainian, and White Russian congregations is accelerated by two theological educational centers in Warsaw and Chylice and by publications in Polish, Russian, and Ukrainian.

The uniting of the Hungarian, Russian, and Serbian Orthodox remaining in Hungary after the First World War caused great difficulties, since the patriarchates of Constantinople, Serbia, and Rumania claimed rights of jurisdiction. In 1947 the Orthodox Church in Hungary—40,000 faithful, 50 congregations, 37 ecclesiastics—was taken over by the patriarchate of Moscow, which entrusted the church administration to an archimandrite and in 1949 granted it autonomy. In 1959 it acquired a Hungarian ritual.

The Orthodox in Czechoslovakia united, after the First World War, two smaller groups in Bohemia-Moravia (ca. 20,000 faithful) and in Slovakia (9,000) and a larger group of 112,000 in Carpatho-Ukraine. Most congregations belonged to the Serbian, a few to the ecumenical patriarchate. In the German protectorate of Bohemia-Moravia and in Slovakia they were forbidden during the Second World War. In the Czechoslovak People's Republic they revived and in 1947 they experienced a considerable growth through the repatriation of 30,000 Volhynia Czechs and in 1949–50 through the incorporation of almost 350,000 Uniate Catholics from the forcibly suppressed dioceses of Mukačevo and Prešov. In 1946 the Orthodox Church in Czechoslovakia was incorporated into the patriarchate of Moscow, which sent to Prague as its exarch Jelevferij, who in 1948 became archbishop. In 1951 Patriarch Alexej released him from his obedience and declared the Church's autocephaly. The metropolitans Jelevferij (1951–55), Joann (1956–64), and Dorotej (since 1964) unified the church organization (4 dioceses) and expanded the Orthodox theological faculty in Prešov and the ecclesiastical press. When the Communist Party leadership under Dubček in 1968 allowed the reconstitution of the Uniate Catholic Church, more than 200 congregations of Orthodoxy were dissolved and the number of its faithful—Czechs, Slovaks, Ukrainians, Russians—dropped to 100,000. In addition, from 1969 the Orthodox fell under strict control of the officials of the State Church Department and, like all other Churches, were subjected to the influence of increasing antireligious propaganda.

Out of the Russian Orthodox missionary work in the Far East grew two independent Churches in China and Japan. After the outbreak of the revolution in 1917 many Orthodox Russians remained in China[43] and Manchuria; their centers in Charbin, Peking, and Shanghai exercised a certain power of attraction even on the native population. In 1920 Tikhon, patriarch of Moscow, entrusted the direction of the Church to Archbishop Innokentij (1902–31). Through the influx of refugees from Lithuania, White Russia, and other parts of the Soviet Union, who subordinated themselves to the Russian Foreign Church, the church organization was expanded for 200,000 faithful. The juxtaposition of various jurisdictions, political confusion, civil wars, and the proclamation of the People's Republic of China in 1949 induced a large part of the Russian faithful to emigrate to North and South America and Australia. The Russian Foreign Church lost all its property in China and Manchuria. The patriarchate of Moscow appointed Archbishop Victor of Peking as exarch (1950–56), gave the see of Shanghai to the Chinese Bishop Simeon, who had been ordained in Moscow by Patriarch Alexej, and 1957 granted autonomy to the Orthodox Church in China, with five bishops and 20,000 faithful. Its head, the Chinese Bishop Basileios (1957–62), resided in Peking. In his time there began, after the expulsion of all Russian clerics, the closing of churches. During the Cultural Revolution of 1966–69 all churches were destroyed or deprived of their purpose, and the church organization was shattered. It cannot be ascertained whether the Chinese clergy survived the persecution of Christians and how they operate underground.

The beginnings of the Orthodox Church in Japan go back to the Russian clergy working in Tokyo at the embassy after 1861. In the period between the wars it was incorporated into the Russian Foreign Church and in 1939 produced its own constitution. From 1945 the patriarchate of Moscow strove to attach the congregations again to itself. In 1961, on the occasion of the centennial celebration, it sent a delegation to Tokyo and in 1967 appointed Bishop Nikoly as metropolitan. In 1970 it granted autonomy to the Church in Japan, with 1 archbishop, 2 bishops, 38 priests, and ca. 40,000 faithful.

FOREIGN CHURCHES

The number of Orthodox Christians outside the original lands of the Eastern Churches is estimated as 4 million. About one-half belong to the jurisdictions already described, especially in North and South America, Australia, and various Western European nations. In addition, emigrant Russians, Ukrainians, and White Russians have set up autonomous Churches, especially in America.

---

[43] G. Seide, "Die Russisch-Orthodoxe Kirche in China und in der Mandschurei seit dem Jahre 1918," OstkSt 25 (1976), 166–92.

The Russian Orthodox Church outside Russia, which, founded in Constantinople, designated itself as autocephalous in 1920, in 1921 transferred its seat to Karlowitz,[44] in 1944 to Munich, and in 1955 to Jordanville, New York, in the United States. It includes many congregations which reject the atheistic government of their homeland and, despite several splinterings, still maintains itself. In 1963 and 1972 respectively the Bulgarian Orthodox Foreign Church in America and the Rumanian Orthodox Missionary Diocese in the Western Hemisphere joined it. Since 1964 the Metropolitan Filaret in New York is the head of the Russian Orthodox Foreign Church, with 7 dioceses in North America, 3 in South America, 3 in Europe, and 1 in Australia-New Zealand, 22 monasteries, and 1 theological educational center at Jordanville, its intellectual center, which also publishes two periodicals. In addition, individual congregations in Africa, Asia, Europe, and the United States have subjected themselves to it. Its hierarchy—2 metropolitans, 11 archbishops, 5 bishops, and 1 episcopal vicar—and 150,000 faithful are unanimous in their rejection of antireligious Communism, but their notion of the Church, their claim to represent all Russian emigrants in their synods, and their isolated position in the totality of Orthodoxy jeopardize their future.

The Orthodox Church in America, whose beginnings lie in the Russian mission to Alaska at the end of the eighteenth century, in 1919 made the first moves to its autonomy, declared its autonomy in 1924 and its autocephaly in 1970. The patriarchate of Moscow, which in 1931 and later wished in vain to restore union with it, consented, whereas the ecumenical patriarchate refused. Metropolitan Irenej, since 1965 archbishop of New York, since 1970 first hierarch of the autocephalous Church, and the Holy Synod direct 11 dioceses[45]—6 metropolitans, 7 bishops, 800,000 faithful—3 theological seminaries, 4 monasteries, and a comprehensive ecclesiastical press organization. In the liturgy, besides Church Slavonic and English, Albanian, Greek, Rumanian, Spanish, and the native tongue of Alaska are used.

Emigrant White Russians, with reference to the autocephaly proclaimed by Metropolitan Melchisedek at Minsk in 1922, established the White Russian Orthodox Church in Exile in 1948. At its council in May 1972, 39 delegates of congregations in the United States, Canada, Belgium, and England elected Archbishop Andrei of Cleveland as metropolitan, assisted by an episcopal vicar for the pastoral care of 5,000 faithful, and decided on a constitution.

The Ukrainian Orthodox Foreign Church in 1973 united three

---

[44] It called itself the Synodal Church of Karlowitz.

[45] Under it is also the Albanian archdiocese of America.

Ukrainian church groups in an independent unity: The Ukrainian-Greek Orthodox Church in Canada, which had originated in 1918 and had declared itself autocephalous in 1951 with its first metropolitan Hilarion, is administered since 1975 by Metropolitan Mstyslav, in office since 1969, of the autocephalous Ukrainian Orthodox Church in Exile—3 dioceses in Australia, England, and Western Europe, and 20,000 faithful—since 1971 also metropolitan of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church in the United States and South America—1 archbishop, 2 bishops, and 130,000 faithful.

In the last years all Orthodox emigrant Churches tended to a comprehensive church organization, with the aim of creating a patriarchate for America. The membership of many congregations in their mother Church, the persistence of national peculiarities, and the consolidating of the independent Churches in America that had grown in the twentieth century allowed at the time no prospect for realizing this plan.

The Orthodox are aware of the fact of their fragmentation. From an all Orthodox Council,[46] which the patriarch Athenagoras had urged in 1961, they expected a clarification of basic theological questions and problems of pastoral care, of the canon law organization of the diaspora, of their relations to one another and to the ecumenical patriarchate, and of their honorary rank and attitude to the ecumene. The prosynodal conference at Chambésy in 1971 drew up a catalogue of more than one-hundred themes, which was restricted and made more precise at the Orthodox Academy on Crete in 1974 and at the first preconciliar conference at Chambésy in 1976.

The Eastern Pre-Chalcedonian National Churches

To this group belong two Nestorian Churches and several Monophysite Churches: the West Syrian Jacobite, the Syrian Orthodox in India with its branches, the Coptic, the Ethiopian, and the Armenian.

THE NESTORIAN CHURCHES

The Apostolic Catholic Church of the East, as the self-designation of the Nestorian or Assyrian Orthodox Church officially reads, has never recovered from the crisis into which the First World War threw it. After the death of Patriarch Simon XX Paul (1918–20) he was succeeded by his twelve-year-old brother, Simon XXI Jesse (1920–73), who was first sent to England for his theological formation. The Assyrians, who had settled in northern Iraq and along the Syrian frontier, were exposed to new persecutions in Iraq in 1933–36, and many emigrated to the United States. From 1940 the patriarch resided at Chicago, from 1954 at San Francisco. In 1961–62 he visited his congregations in southern India, where in 1907 Uniate Thomas Christians, as descendants of adherents of Bishop Mellos, had joined the Nestorian Church as Mellusians, and in Lebanon and Iran, whereas entry into Iraq and Syria was denied him. He did not succeed in recovering his authority, shaken by his decades-long absence. When in 1964, without a synodal decision, from San Francisco he decreed liturgical innovations by curtailing the length of Lent and introducing the Gregorian Calendar, the result was a schism. In 1968 the Mellusian Bishop Thomas Darmo of Trichur was elected patriarch by his opponents, but he died a year later. In 1970 there occurred an understanding between the Iraqi government and the Nestorians, who in 1933 and 1961 had taken part in the Kurds' struggle for freedom. All churches expropriated or destroyed in the last five decades were to be given back or rebuilt. The esteem of Simon XXI Jesse seemed to become consolidated after his visit in Iraq, but criticism of his stay abroad did not end. The desire for his return became stronger when the dissatisfaction of many Nestorians became noticeable in their passing over to the Jacobite Church and the Uniate Chaldeans. In 1973 the patriarch gave up his office and married the same year. A synod in Lebanon deposed him, laicized him, and deprived him of the power to dispose of all church property.

---

[46] F. W. Fernau, "Die Ostkirche im Vorfeld ihres Konzils. Konstitutionelle Gegenwartsprobleme der Orthodoxie," Ökumenische Rundschau 20 (1971), 140–57; D. Papandreou, "Zur Vorbereitung der Panorthodoxen Synode," Una Sancta 29 (1974), 161–165; R. Stupperich, "Die Heilige oder Grosse Orthodoxe Synode," Kirche im Osten 17 (1974), 180f.; H. J. Härtel, "Die erste vorkonziliare panorthodoxe Konferenz in Chambésy," Der christliche Osten 32 (1977), 83–89 and 92.

Thereby the Nestorian Old Church of the East gained the prospect of uniting all Nestorian groups in Iraq, Iran, Lebanon, India, Syria, Turkey, the Soviet Union, the United States, and on Cyprus—ca. 100,000 faithful. Since 1969 Catholicos-Patriarch Addai II has worked for this end from Baghdad.

THE MONOPHYSITE CHURCHES

The West Syrian Jacobite Church is subject to the patriarch of Antioch and the entire East. The title recalls the flowering of the Syrian Orthodox Church in the early Middle Ages. The patriarchs, who after the First World War stabilized ecclesiastical matters in the Middle East and had to struggle with the movement for autonomy of the Indian daughter Church, removed their residence from Diarbekr to Homs in 1932 and to Damascus in 1959. Ignatius XXXVIII Ephraem (1933–57) acquired merit as a church historian, founder of a seminary, and through the building of schools and the printing of liturgical books. In 1953 he erected a special eparchy for Jacobites who had emigrated to the United States. His successor, Ignatius XXXIX Jacob III Severus (from 1957), united more closely by means of repeated visitation journeys his congregations in Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, North and South America, southern India, and in the hills of Tur 'Abdin in southeastern Turkey—ca. 120,000 faithful. He took an interest in the Turkish foreign workers scattered in the diaspora—in the German Federal Republic, the Netherlands, and Switzerland. Since 1964 he has been assisted by a lay council of twelve members, which takes care of financial, technical administrative, and educational questions. Furthermore, he championed a union of all Monophysite Churches and made contacts with representatives of Orthodox and other Christian Churches. The erecting of churches, monasteries, and schools are signs of a certain revival of this Patriarchal Church.

The Syrian Christians in South India, for whom the collective name of Thomas Christians is often employed, are today split into fifteen different communities.[47] Conflicts between the Jacobite Thomas Christians and the West Syrian patriarchate of Antioch led in 1911 to the independence of the Syrian Orthodox Malabar (Malankara) Church.[48] The Indian metropolitan Dionysius VI (1908–34), from 1912 catholicos of the East, accorded to the patriarch of Antioch only a primacy of honor. Efforts for reconciliation of the two Churches failed. The ecclesiastical constitution issued under Catholicos Mar Basileios III George II (1929–62, d. 1964) deprived the patriarch of any administrative function in India. Difficulties and litigation, prolonged for decades, over church property between the majority of the faithful in the Malabar Church and the minority, which clung to union with the patriarch, produced a tense atmosphere. In 1950 there ensued a certain understanding, which was confirmed by the preparations for the nineteenth centennial Thomas Celebration celebrated in 1952 by all Christian denominations.[49] The two struggling groups in 1955 recognized the patriarch of Antioch as the highest spiritual authority and agreed on the subordination of the faithful in South India to the catholicos residing at Kottayam. In 1958 Patriarch Ignatius XXXIX Jacob III Severus assented to their autonomy under Catholicos Basileios III George II. Basileios IV Eugene I (1964–75), appointed administrator at his desire in 1962, was enthroned by him. He devoted himself to the completing of ecclesiastical institutions. On the revision of the church constitution[50] the Malabar Church was in 1967 designated as part of the Syrian Orthodox Church. But the agreement arrived at by way of discussion in no sense ended the internal difficulties between the adherents of the functioning catholicos and the patriarch of Antioch; in several cities two rival bishops confronted each other. Of the ca. 1.25 million faithful, since 1975 three-fourths adhere to Mar Basileios V Matthew I and one-fourth to Mar Basileios Paul II, both of whom bear the title of catholicos of the East and metropolitan of Malankara.

---

[47] F. Verghese, Die Syrischen Kirchen, 11–14; cf. also P. J. Podipara, op. cit., 178–89.

[48] "Malankara" is in the Majalajam language the term for "Malabar," the southwest Indian coastal plain, in which live most Syrian Orthodox faithful. "Malankara" is the short form of "Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church."

[49] The Apostle Thomas is said to have landed at Mailapur near Madras in A.D. 52 and begun his mission.

Besides the small Monophysite Church of Thozhijur (Andschur) in North Cerala (4,000 faithful), which ca. 1772 separated from the Syrian Orthodox mother Church as an independent Jacobite Church, the Syrian Mar Thomas Church must be mentioned. At the time of its origin in the nineteenth century, in addition to the question of autonomy, the alleged recourse to the Old Christian Church of Saint Thomas, the adoption of reform ideas, Anglican influences, and changes in the liturgy played a role. From these reformed Jacobites, also called Anglo-Syrians, whose 250,000 faithful are directed by Metropolitan Yuhana Mar Thomas at Tiruvalla, there split away in 1961 the Evangelical Saint Thomas Church in India, to which ca. 2,500 adherents in ten congregations belong.

The Coptic Church, under the "Pope and Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria and all Africa," gained in internal stability in the last decades, despite the political changes in Egypt, Arab nationalism, and the strengthening of Islam. Under Patriarch Cyril V (1874–1927) the Copts obtained in the constitution of 1923 civil equality with Muslims; the constitution proclaimed in 1956 guaranteed the equality of all citizens without regard for religion, but actually Islam remained Egypt's state religion. His successors had to contend with the lay representation in the National Council (Maglis Milli), which strove to extend its right to share in church administration. Patriarch John XIX (1928–42) increased the church schools and the printing of publications in church history and dogmatic theology. With Macarius III (1944–45) a proved practical shepherd of souls was elected, who showed himself open to efforts for church reform. Joasaph II (1946–56) protested against the growing Muslim fanaticism, which aimed to drive all non-Muslims from public offices, and in 1948 regulated the relations with the Ethiopian Church. When, after a vacancy of three years, an agreement had been achieved between the National Council and the Holy Synod on the election of the new patriarch, Cyril VI (1959–71) occupied the Coptic patriarchal throne. He reorganized the ecclesiastical administration by a series of committees for instruction, press, and monasteries. In 1960 he opened the new Coptic theological academy at Cairo. In spite of the confiscation of the greatest part of church property by the government, he succeeded in maintaining good relations with President Nasser (1956–1970), who financially supported the establishing of a patriarchal center and the rebuilding of Saint Mark's Cathedral at Cairo and took part in the laying of the cornerstone. His cooperation in the movement of liturgical renewal, in which the Arabic language established itself, in the formation of priests and monks, in the lessening of tension with the Ethiopian Church, in the holding of conferences with Monophysite and Orthodox Churches, especially in the Monophysite Synod at Addis Ababa from 7 to 21 January 1965,[51] in the dedication celebration of Saint Mark's Cathedral from 24 to 26 June 1968, and in the pastoral care of emigrant Copts attest to the diversity of his successful activity. He was succeeded by Bishop Amba Schenucha, responsible since 1962 for religious education, who as patriarch since 1971 is called Schenucha III. He reorganized the education of priests and monks and completed the theological academy. Like his predecessor, he stood for a rapprochement of the Monophysite Churches and a reunion of Eastern and Western Christianity.[52] The Coptic Church with ca. 4 million faithful suffers from Muslim intolerance, but its consolidation, the spiritual power of its monasteries, the receptiveness to modern problems, and its missionary work among Muslims deserve notice.

---

[50] P. Verghese, Die Syrischen Kirchen, 169–80.

The Ethiopian Church, one of the oldest Christian national Churches, daughter Church of the Coptic patriarchate, acquired its autocephaly in 1959 through the determined exertions of Haile Selassie, Negus from 1928 to 1930 and Emperor from 1930 to 1974 (d. 1975). For decades he strove to make the forces of the religious tradition of his country fruitful for the present by tightening the external organization and reforms of the Church. He saw to the printing of liturgical books with texts in the ecclesiastical language, Geez, and their translation into the Amharic language of conversation, the founding of a theological seminary at Addis Ababa in 1944, which in 1961 was integrated into the university as the theological faculty, and theological schools in the individual eparchies, raised the level of cantors, deacons, and monks, and insisted on preaching.

While the Coptic patriarchs appointed an Egyptian monk as metropolitan and abuna ("our Father") of the entire Ethiopian Church, five

---

[51] The Synod met under the chairman Cyril VI (cf. The Oriental-Orthodox Churches Addis Ababa Conference, January 1965 [Addis Ababa 1965]; E. Hammerschmidt, "Die Kirchenkonferenz von Addis Ababa," Kirche im Osten 9 [1966], 13–21.)

[52] After the visit of Schenucha III to Pope Paul VI in May 1973 a mixed commission of Catholics and Copts was set up, which held its first general meeting in March 1974.

Ethiopian monks were assigned to Abuna Cyril (1926–50) as bishops. The freeing of the Ethiopian Church from the Coptic was hastened by the Italian occupation of the country (1935–36), which entrusted native dignitaries with ecclesiastical administration, and the centralizing imperial administration of the Emperor after his return from exile in 1941. In 1946 Cyril returned to Egypt; in 1948 he turned over the administration of the Church to the native Etschegen Basileios, the superior general of all monasteries, monks, and nuns. Under Abuna Basileios (1951–59) the number of Ethiopian bishops was increased, the educational and charitable systems completed. At the insistence of Emperor Haile Selassie, Coptic Patriarch Cyril VI elevated him to patriarch and catholicos of Ethiopia (1959–70). To the Coptic patriarch remained only the supreme direction of the jurisdictional sphere of Saint Mark, which embraced also Ethiopia, and the right to ordain the Ethiopian patriarch. In addition to intensifying the formation of priests, teachers of religion, and missionaries, Patriarch Basileios cultivated relations with all Monophysite Churches.[53] He succeeded in obtaining in the radio station "Voice of the Gospel," established in the capital in 1963 by the Lutheran World Association, and in the state radio system, broadcasting time for the Patriarchal Church. In broadcasting work conservative and progressive ideas clashed. Theophilos I (Tewoflos, 1971–76) became his successor. His effort to continue church reform was hampered by the revolution of 1974–75, which deposed and interned Emperor Haile Selassie in 1974, annulled the privileges of the state Church, and expropriated its landed property. The patriarch protested against the draft of a new constitution, which envisaged equal religious rights for all Ethiopians—40 percent Monophysites, 35 percent Muslims, 20 percent pagans—but promised support of the regime. A heavy tax imposed on the episcopate was welcomed by the lower clergy; it had hopes from the political and social upheavals for an improvement of the living conditions of the Church, which had been burdened by the connection with the toppled dynasty. These "People's Priests" partly adopted directions which the first two patriarchs had already begun, including improvement of instruction and preaching, acceptance of connections with the sister Churches, but had encountered the hidden resistance of many clerics and monks, and partly they aligned themselves with radical reform demands. True, Theophilos I was able, by his personality, to bridge over the opposition that broke out among his ca. 12 million faithful, but he was supplanted by Patriarch Malaku Walda Michael.

---

[53] At the Synod of Addis Ababa in 1965 (above, n. 1) there was discussion of ways and means of gaining more young intellectuals for service in the Church and of missionary groups for the proclamation of the Gospel and instruction of the newly baptized.

The Armenian Apostolic Church, or Gregorian Church,[54] is at present split among the catholicates of Echmiadzin and Cilicia, the patriarchates of Constantinople and Jerusalem, and a widespread diaspora. When the Armenians in the Ottoman Empire defended themselves against their increasing oppression, they were cruelly subjugated by the Turks in six waves of pogroms from 1894 to 1922, but especially in 1915–16.[55] Because of bloody massacres, deportations to Syria and Mesopotamia, forced conversions to Islam, and emigration, the patriarchate of Constantinople lost two-thirds of its faithful; some 2,050 churches and 203 monasteries were burned. By the Peace Treaty of Sèvres in 1920, Armenia again became a separate nation, but it was able to maintain its independence only one month before it was divided between Turkey and the Soviet Union.

The catholicate of Echmiadzin, which had been subject to the control of the Russian state Church since 1836, recovered its independence for a brief period (1917–20) after the Russian Revolution. In the Transcaucasian Republic of the Soviet Union (1922) the Church fell into the wake of Communist domination. Catholicos Kevork V (George, 1912–30) successfully opposed the Armenian Reformed Church propagated by the regime from 1924–25, a parallel to the "Living Church,"[56] which was joined only by a few bishops. Among the people it found no echo. And so the government tried to put pressure on the catholicos, "the supreme patriarch of all Armenians," for gaining the Armenians in foreign countries. Catholicos Choren (1932–38), who as administrator had already made extensive declarations of loyalty, obtained the reopening of some churches and the restoration of church property for the maintenance of the cathedral and the monastic establishments of Echmiadzin. Although in his pastoral letters he greeted the achievements for the economic and cultural uplifting of Soviet Armenia, he became a victim of the increasing persecution of the Church. Deputy Catholicos Kevork, in office since 1938, was powerless against further closings of churches and imprisoning of priests. In the Second World War he summoned the Armenians to join together for armed unity. Stalin permitted his election as Catholicos Kevork VI (1945–54), the recovery of the seminary at Erivan—all ecclesiastical educational centers had been closed in 1928—and the publication of a periodical. The appeal of the catholicos to the Armenians abroad to return to Soviet Armenia, his styling himself "patriarch of all Armenia" instead of the previous "of all Armenians," his claim to leadership of all Armenian jurisdictional areas, and his collaboration with the Patriarchal Church of Moscow facilitated for him the ordination of ten bishops and a certain stabilizing of church life, but he could not make up for the severe damage[57] the Church had suffered between the two world wars. At the Church assembly of 1955–56, in which ninety-seven delegates from the Soviet Union and forty from abroad took part, Vasgen, the Armenian supreme shepherd of the Bulgarian-Rumanian diocese, was elected catholicos. As a leading member of the peace movement in Rumania and because of his positive statements on the support of the Armenian national character by the Soviet Union, he was agreeable to the regime. Through his foreign journeys (1956–61), through the national synod convoked by him to Echmiadzin in 1962—of 137 delegates eighty-seven were from abroad—and the "All-Armenian Synod" at Echmiadzin in 1969, which was to prepare for an Armenian Orthodox council, he bound the patriarchates of Constantinople and Jerusalem closer to his catholicate, even if he did not succeed in realizing the desired rapprochement with the catholicate of Cilicia. The versatile catholicos undertook other foreign journeys, on which he consolidated the relations to the diaspora eparchies subject to him, made contacts with Eastern and Western church leaders, and helped his Church acquire international repute. His reports on the revival of religious sentiment in Soviet Armenia cannot conceal the fact that his Church of ca. 2 to 3 million faithful has only slight possibilities of development. To the catholicate belong another 500,000 Armenians in Iraq, Western Europe, and North, Central, and South America.[58]

---

[54] The Church takes its name from Gregory the Illuminator (d. ca. 325), first bishop of all Armenia (cf. A. S. Atiya, op. cit., 317–22).

[55] J. Bryce, The Treatment of Armenians in the Ottoman Empire 1915–16 (London 1916); F. Nansen, Betrogenes Volk. Eine Studienreise durch Georgien und Armenien als Oberkommissar des Völkerbundes (Leipzig 1928); J. Lepsius, Der Todesgang des armenischen Volkes, 4th ed. (Potsdam 1930); B. Brentjes, op. cit., 9–15.

[56] See above, p. 482.

The Armenian Apostolic Church of the catholicate of Cilicia, which is responsible for Armenians in Lebanon, North America, Syria, Iran, and on Cyprus—600,000 faithful—has maintained its independence. Its catholicoi resided from 1293 to 1921 at Sis, the capital of the medieval Little Armenian Kingdom of Cilicia. Persecuted by the Turks, the Armenians fled to Syria and Lebanon, where they created a new center at Antelias, north of Beirut. The successive catholicoi Garegin (1945–

---

[57] The number of churches dropped between 1915 and 1954 in European Russia from 1,446 to 89, in the Armenian Soviet Republic from 491 to 38, in Georgia from 287 to 14, in Azerbaijan from 473 to 30. In the Georgian capital of Tiflis, of the 28 Armenian churches before the First World War, only 2 are left (W. Kolarz, op. cit., 166f.).

[58] The Armenians in the United States are under an archbishop in New York in only a loose dependence on the catholicate of Echmiadzin.

52) and Sarech I (1956–63) struggled with the Catholicate of Echmiadzin over the security and the extension of their jurisdiction until Catholicos Choren, in office from 1963, succeeded in consolidating his Church internally and externally, and made contacts with the other Monophysite communities and with Orthodox and Western Churches.

The Armenian Gregorian patriarchate of Constantinople now cares for 50,000 Armenians in Turkey.[59] To the Armenian patriarchate of Jerusalem belong 6,000 faithful in Israel and Jordan. Both patriarchates are pretty intimately united to that of Echmiadzin.

The Eastern national Churches have in their venerable liturgies preserved the primitive Christian stock of ideas to the present. Conditioned by political circumstances, they lived considerably isolated for centuries. Not until the twentieth century did they meet one another, loosen the hardened fronts among them and Orthodoxy, and begin dialogues with the Roman Catholic Church. In 1971, 1973, and 1976 Monophysite and Catholic theologians met at Vienna[60] to prepare the way for a reunion of the separated Churches. In the center of their discussion stood the Christological definition of the Council of Chalcedon, on whose formulation a unanimous interpretation was sought, and the value and evaluation of ecumenical councils and of the "Petrine Office." The beginnings of mutual understanding of Eastern and Orthodox Churches, of Eastern and Western Christianity, are becoming clear. When and how the diversity of Eastern Churches will flow into the unity asked by Christ in his high-priestly prayer (John 17:20–21) lies on another plane.

---

[59] Before 1914 there were in Turkey 1,700 parishes and 1,600 churches, in the mid-twentieth century 42 parishes and 38 churches (W. Kolarz, op. cit., 150).

[60] The consultations took place in the framework of the foundation Pro Oriente, called into existence by Franz Cardinal König in 1964.

SECTION THREE

The Church in the Individual Countries

CHAPTER 17

*The Church in Northern, Eastern, and Southern Europe

The end of the First World War produced fundamental upheavals in northern, eastern, and southern Europe. On the ruins of the destroyed Habsburg and Romanov empires arose new or very different national states, which in their reorganization and the building of their new structure made use of the help of religious groups. In the overwhelmingly Catholic countries, such as Lithuania, Poland, and Hungary, therefore, Catholicism flourished, whereas in countries with a majority of Orthodox population, like Rumania, Yugoslavia, and Bulgaria, the independent Eastern Churches[1] obtained a leading position. However, in these states, as also in Czechoslovakia, which represented a sort of special case, and in the Scandinavian and Baltic countries with a Protestant majority, the Catholic Church was able to develop freely, due to the middle-class democracies. Only the Soviet Union constituted an exception. For its Communist, strictly antireligious ideology led to an unprecedented anti-Church struggle, which, after the Second World War, in consequence of the Soviet seizure of power in eleven nations in all of eastern and southern Europe, it was extended to almost 70 million Catholics. Only from the early 1960s did the situation begin to relax gradually in the course of international politics. The long-range method of the interior withering of the Church replaced the open struggle against it. But the changed international situation also made it possible for the Holy See, through a reoriented policy, to hasten to the aid of the oppressed Church in the East.

The Scandinavian Countries

In Denmark Catholicism could continue after the First World War its upsurge that had begun at the turn of the century. As a result of numerous and important conversions the number of the faithful grew within eighteen years from 3,000 to 15,000, and in 1938 to 22,000 in a

---

* Gabriel Adriányi

[1] Cf. the explanation in Chapter 16.

Protestant population of 4.2 million. Due to the circumstances of domestic policy, the Church displayed a vigorous activity in pastoral care, charity, the press, and the care of youth. Thirty new churches, chapels, seven schools, and nine hospitals were built. The number of Catholics rose also on the Danish islands. In 1923 the Holy See established a prefecture apostolic in Iceland, which was raised to a vicariate apostolic in 1929. Great ecclesiastical celebrations and meetings[2] made clear the strength and importance obtained by Danish Catholicism. The German occupation of Denmark from 1940 to 1945 brought trouble for the Church especially in economic respects. However, the Catholic renewal could not only maintain itself but continue its development. During and after the Second World War Denmark admitted for the time being some 250,000 refugees, including 24,000 Catholics, and this especially gave an impetus to charity. In keeping with the favorable development of the postwar years, Pius XII in 1953 made Copenhagen a diocese and placed it immediately under the Holy See. Since then Danish Catholicism has displayed a vigorous activity, especially in the care of souls, education, and social work.

Because of the powerful Lutheran state-Church system, the unfamiliarity of Catholicism, and the large diaspora, the Catholic mission in Sweden was able to develop less favorably. Through tireless missionary work, but especially through the immigration of ca. 20,000 Catholic refugees during and after the Second World War, especially from Eastern Europe, the situation of the Church could gradually improve. In the process of the erecting of the autonomous Scandinavian hierarchy, Pius XII in 1953 also elevated the vicariate apostolic of Stockholm to a bishopric. True, in the most recent period the Church obtained a greater importance, numbering in 1974 already 63,063 faithful, with 26 parishes, 115 diocesan priests, 77 male religious, and 230 female religious; but, now as earlier, the old difficulties[3] hampered a more comprehensive evangelization.

As in Sweden, the Catholic mission in Norway could acquire greater importance only in the most recent period because of immigration and conversions. Here the number of Catholics in a population of 3.6 million grew in 1974 to 9,127, who were cared for in 17 parishes by 20 priests, 34 male religious, and 382 sisters. Here too in 1953 Pius XII founded its own ecclesiastical organization: out of the vicariate apostolic erected in 1931 came the see of Oslo and two other vicariates apostolic.

---

[2] In 1923, visit of Cardinal Willem van Rossum; and 1926 Saint Anschar's Year; in 1932 Eucharistic Congress at Copenhagen; in 1935 Saint Knut's Year; cf. also W. van Rossum, Die religiöse Lage der Katholiken in den nordischen Lädern (Munich 1924).

[3] For example, lack of financial means, great distances, Protestant milieu.

Of course, in Norway Catholics represent a very small minority in the diaspora, but their religious life is exemplary.

Like Sweden and Norway, the Catholic Church in Finland has only a small number of faithful—2,959 in 1974—who live dispersed among 4.6 million Protestants. Here in 1955 Pius XII organized its own hierarchy, the see of Helsinki, after the Finnish Catholics had in 1920 been separated from the archbishopric of Mogilev and obtained a vicariate of their own. In spite of some restrictions,[4] the Church in Finland enjoys free activity.[5]

The Baltic Countries

The Republic of Estonia, proclaimed on 2 April 1918 but only recognized in international law on 26 January 1921, embraced at its independence 47,549 square kilometers with a population of ca. 1.1 million, of whom 77.6 percent belonged to the Lutheran and only 2,327—.2 percent—to the Catholic Church. In 1940 the latter were cared for in six parishes by eleven priests and about twenty religious of both sexes. Since the faithful had previously been subject to the Russian archbishopric of Mogilev, a special apostolic administration, under a titular archbishop, was erected for them in 1925. The first Soviet occupation in 1940, then the incorporation of Estonia after the end of the German occupation into the Soviet Union in 1945, and the implementation of the Soviet religious policy completely destroyed the organization and life of the Church in Estonia.

Like Estonia, the Republic of Latvia appeared on 18 November 1918 as a result of the collapse of the Russian Empire, and, also like Estonia, it did not receive recognition in international law until 26 January 1921. The new nation had a total area of 65,791 square kilometers with a population of 1.8 million. The majority of the population was Lutheran—58 percent—but here the number of Catholics amounted to 450,210 souls—23.69 percent—in 1930. For them the Holy See restored the old see of Riga as early as 1918 and removed it from the earlier diocesan union of Mogilev and Kaunas. Because of religious liberty and the accommodating policy of the state, the Church was able quickly to develop. There appeared religious institutions, societies, seminaries, a Catholic theological faculty and a considerable Catholic press. In order further to complete the ecclesiastical organization and to clarify the relations of state and Church, Latvia conducted discussions with the Holy See in 1920, which ended on 30 May 1922 with the concluding of a concordat.[6] The concordat guaranteed the Church full possibility of development and called into existence the archbishopric of Riga and the suffragan bishopric of Kurland-Semgallen, with its seat at Liepaja. The outbreak of the Second World War, the events of the war, the forcible annexation of the country to the Soviet Union on 21 June 1940, and Soviet domination also made a quick end of the flourishing life of the Church here too. All church organizations were forbidden, and bishops were imprisoned. The number of priests dropped from 207 in 1944 to 143 in 1967. After 1963 the situation relaxed a bit. Thus the one vicar general for the two sees of Riga and Liepaja could take part in the Second Vatican Council and in 1964 receive episcopal ordination at Rome.

---

[4] For example, the founding of monasteries is forbidden.

[5] For the Scandinavian missions cf. the Jahrbücher des St.-Ansgarius-Werkes, St. Ansgar, published by the directors of the St.-Ansgarius-Werk of Cologne and of the St.-Ansgar-Werk of Munich.

Lithuania declared its political sovereignty on 16 February 1918, but, after Poland had occupied Lithuanian Vilna, and Lithuania the district of Memel that was under Polish rule, it was recognized in international law only on 8 May 1924. The republic covered 58,810 square kilometers with a population of 2.3 million, of whom 1.7 million were Catholics. They lived in two dioceses and in 1929 had 388 parishes and 1,072 priests.[7] Although the overwhelming majority of the population was Catholic, and the Church had fostered the independence of Lithuania with all its power in the most recent past, there occurred repeated conflicts between Lithuania and the Holy See because of the question of Vilna. When the Polish concordat of 1925 left the see of Vilna with Poland, the diplomatic relations assumed in 1920 between Lithuania and the Vatican were broken. On 4 April 1926 Pius XI created a Lithuanian ecclesiastical province by the bull Lituanorum gente.[8] He elevated Kaunas to an archbishopric and subjected to it four new dioceses and a prelacy nullius. But since this took place without previous consultation with the Lithuanian government, the government did not recognize the papal bull. Long and difficult negotiations between the Holy See and Lithuania led on 10 December 1927 to the concluding of a concordat.[9] It restored diplomatic relations between the Vatican and the republic, guaranteed the complete freedom of the Church, and confirmed the new Lithuanian ecclesiastical organization. Church life flourished. In 1939 there were already 800 parishes, more than 1,500 priests, and 600 candidates for the priesthood in 4 seminaries and a Catholic theological faculty. Also the Catholic press and religious institutes renewed themselves energetically. But the political conflicts from 1938 on, the Second World War, the invasion of the Soviet army after a three-year occupation by the Germans (1941–44), and the incorporation of Lithuania into the Soviet Union on 3 August 1940 made a quick end of this development. The new rulers denounced the concordat in 1940 and introduced the same measures as in the two other Baltic nations. Also there occurred a mass deportation, which annihilated not only the entire hierarchy and a great part of the clergy but also a third of the Catholic population of Lithuania. In 1955 there were only one bishop, impeded from carrying out his office, and 75 seminarians. The number of priests dropped in 1969 to 834, of whom 300 had passed the age of sixty years.

---

[6] AAS 14(1922), 577–81

[7] Of whom 38 were religious priests.

[8] AAS 18(1926), 121–23.

[9] Ibid. 19(1927), 425–31.

After 1963 the situation became a bit easier. In 1965 a Lithuanian vicar capitular could be ordained a bishop at Rome, in 1968 a Lithuanian priest in his own country, and in 1969 two other priests. In 1967 two bishops could journey to Rome. However, just how unfree the Church is in the Soviet Socialist Republic of Lithuania was shown by the most recent letters of protest and complaint of Lithuanian Catholics and priests, which have in part become known in the West.[10]

The Soviet Union

When, on the collapse of the Empire of the Tsars, the Bolshevik Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic arose in 1918, then in 1922 the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, there was in the new state only a shrinking Catholic minority. For the number of Roman and Uniate Catholics decreased as a consequence of the independence of Poland and of the Baltic nations from 15 to 1.6 million, who now lived among 78 million of other faiths, of whom 71 percent were Orthodox. The Catholics of the Roman Rite, mostly foreigners or non-Russians, were in Russia itself subject to the archbishopric of Mogilev and its four suffragan sees and were all cared for by ca. 4,600 priests in 4,234 churches and 1,978 chapels. But the new frontiers of the state left only the archbishopric[11] and two other dioceses and the vicariate apostolic for the Crimea, the Caucasus, and Siberia, the apostolic administration of the Armenian Rite, and the exarchate of the Slavonic Byzantine Rite in their former extent.

On 23 January 1918 the new rulers proclaimed separation of Church and state and began at once with the dissolving of the organization of the Catholic Church. By 1923 all bishops were imprisoned, expelled, or shot. The normal church administration came to an end with the hierarchy. The number of priests dropped rapidly also through natural and violent deaths, deportations, imprisonment, and the preventing of reception of the priesthood by candidates. All seminaries and the important ecclesiastical academy at Petrograd[12] were dissolved. Most churches and chapels were closed or profaned. Within a few years the external religious life of the Church had been completely destroyed.

---

[10] Cf. HK 26(1972), 339–45.

[11] In 1918 two old dioceses, Minsk and Kamenec, were again attached to the archbishopric.

In view of this situation, the Holy See left nothing untried to stop the destruction of the Church. But repeated diplomatic interventions achieved only the freeing and expelling of Archbishops Eduard von Ropp in 1920 and John Cieplak in 1923. The papal assistance mission in the Soviet Union, visited by famine, which was carried out with the cooperation of the Divine Word Missionaries and a donation of ca. 2 million dollars in 1922–24,[13] did not realize the missionary expectations connected with the giving of aid. Now as earlier, the authorities kept any church activity away from works of charity.

Because of the serious ecclesiopolitical situation and the great upheavals in Eastern Europe, as early as 1917 Benedict XV established the Congregation for the Eastern Churches and in the same year the Institute of Oriental Studies. In the former a special "Commission for Russia" was formed, which worked as an independent office from 1925 to 1934. Since it was of interest to the new Soviet state to obtain recognition in international law, it had been ready to have a nuncio sent to Moscow, despite the retaining of its church policy. The negotiations foundered when Pius XI made the resumption of full diplomatic relations dependent on the attitude of the Soviet government to the Church.

Meanwhile diplomatic "feelers" were not ended. Thus Pius XI could in 1925 and 1926 authorize a member of the papal "Commission for Russia," the Jesuit Michel d'Herbigny, who was ordained a bishop, to arrange a new organization of church administration in the Soviet Union and send him to Moscow. There in 1926 he erected nine apostolic administrations[14] and secretly ordained four bishops. However, this was soon discovered by the state. Monsignor d'Herbigny had to leave the country, and the new bishops were imprisoned. The reorganization of the Church collapsed thereby. Now the whole of ecclesiastical life was paralyzed. Only some fifty to sixty priests escaped the measures of terror, and their activity was strictly supervised. From 1933 a priest in the American Embassy at Moscow could function for the personnel and celebrate Mass in the church of Saint Louis.

---

[12] Cf. A. Petrani, Kolegium Duhowne W Petersburgu (The Ecclesiastical Academy at Petersburg) (Towarzystwo Naukowe 12) (Lublin 1950).

[13] Cf. M. D'Herbigny, "L'aide pontificale aux enfants affamé de Russie," Orientalia Christiana 4(1925), 1–80; J. Kraus, Im Auftrage des Papstes in Russland (Veröffentlichungen des Missionspriesterseminars St. Augustin, Siegburg, no. 21) (Steyl 1970).

[14] Moscow, Mogilev-Minsk, Leningrad, Kharkow, Kazan-Samara(Kuibyshev)-Simbirsk(Ulyanovsk), Odessa, Saratow, Caucasus, and Georgia.

After his predecessor had already in 1920 rejected the Communist ideology in the motu proprio Bonum sana,[15] Pius XI condemned Bolshevism and its violence in numerous declarations,[16] especially in the encyclicals Miserantissimus Redemptor,[17] Caritate Christi compulsi,[18] and Divini Redemptoris.[19] And on 2 February 1930 he summoned all Christianity to prayer services against Communism.[20]

The events at the beginning of and during the Second World War, especially the annexation of eastern Poland, the Baltic nations, Bessarabia, and the Carpatho-Ukraine by the Soviet Union, and the Soviet military occupation of Eastern Europe, as well as the decision of the three-power conference at Yalta from 4 to 11 February 1945 to leave all of Eastern Europe under Soviet influence, had as a result a cruel way of the cross for some 70 million Catholics in eleven countries. The harshest blow, of course, fell on Catholics in the areas incorporated by the Soviet Union.

As early as 1939 the state had moved with all its means against the Uniate Armenians and Ukrainians (the Ruthenians) who lived in the archdiocese of Lvov and its suffragan sees. Church property was confiscated, seminaries were closed, monasteries and churches were plundered. After the end of the German occupation and the second Soviet invasion, the persecution of the Church was resumed and the forcible reincorporation of the Uniates was carried through. The annexation to the Patriarchal Church of Moscow was enforced by an illegal synod on 8 March 1946 after the imprisonment of ten bishops and apostolic administrators. In this way the Catholic Church in the Ukraine was liquidated.[21] In a similar fashion there occurred the return of the Uniates in Carpatho-Ukraine. After the bishop of Užhorod had been eliminated by a fatal automobile accident in 1949, the state's arbitrary measures climaxed on 15 August 1949 in the proclaiming of reunion with the Orthodoxy of Moscow. Meanwhile, 67 churches had been expropriated and 18 priests imprisoned.

---

[15] AAS, 12(1920), 313–317.

[16] Enumerated in ibid. 29(1937), 67.

[17] Ibid. 20(1928), 165–78.

[18] Ibid. 24(1932), 177–94.

[19] Ibid. 29(1937), 65–106.

[20] Ibid. 22(1930), 89–93.

[21] Cf. the talk of Pius XII on 14 November 1952 in AAS 44(1952), 876–78; also, W. de Vries, "Soppressione della Chiesa greco-cattolica nella Subcarpazia," CivCatt 102, 2(1950), 391–99, and M. Lacko, "The Forced Liquidation of the Union of Užhorod," Slovak Studies 1(1961), 145–85.

In 1963 the Vatican's Eastern policy was able to effect the release from prison of the Ukrainian metropolitan of Lvov, Josyf Slipyi. However, the sad situation of the Church in the entire Soviet Union is unchanged.[22]

Poland

Proclaimed by the Central Powers on 5 November 1916, the sovereign Polish state was restored in the Peace Treaty of Versailles on 28 June 1919 after more than a century of total partition. About the same political boundaries were reinstituted as after the second partition in 1793. In 1927 the Republic of Poland included, after some correcting of the frontiers, 385,030 square kilometers; in 1921 it had 27.1 million inhabitants, of whom 20.3 million—75 percent—were Catholics, including 3.5 million Uniates, 2.8 million—10.5 percent—Orthodox, 2.8 million—10.5 percent—Jews, and 1 million—3.8 percent—Protestants. In addition the new nation comprised a variety of national minorities, for the Poles constituted only ca. 78 percent of the population.

If Polish Catholicism was in modern times, especially however during the difficult period of the partition of the state, the unselfish bearer of national interests and the strongest promoter of the reestablishment of state sovereignty, it is not to be wondered at that, thanks to its unbounded popularity, it played a key role in the reconstruction of the state and in public life. Since the boundaries of the ecclesiastical provinces were often at variance with those of the state, the reorganization of the Church's structure took precedence for the episcopate in the reconstruction and standardization of church life. There began discussions between the papal nuncio, Achille Ratti (1919–21), the future Pope Pius XI, the episcopate and the government. They proved to be difficult, but were successful. After nine episcopal sees had been filled in 1919 and in 1920 the diocese of Lodz and in 1922 two apostolic administrations[23] had been erected, there ensued on 10 February 1925 the signing of a concordat[24] between Poland and the Holy See. On the one hand, the concordat guaranteed the complete liberty of the Church and granted the Curia influence on the organization of the Church in

---

[22] Cf. also R. Urban, Die tschechoslowakische hussitische Kirche (Marburger Ostforschungen 34) (Marburg 1973), 111–17.

[23] Danzig, Katowice.

[24] AAS 17(1925), 273–87.

Poland, but on the other hand it took into account the national political wishes of the government.[25] The new diocesan arrangement of Poland was agreed upon in ARTICLE 9; it resulted on 28 October 1925 in the bull Vixdum Poloniae,[26] which in addition to the three existing archbishoprics—Gniezno, Lvov, Warsaw—established two new metropolitanates—Cracow and Vilna—and five more bishoprics. This new ecclesiastical organization was a compromise solution. For the Holy See was seeking to keep the historical dioceses in existence, while the government aspired, by the ecclesiastical reorganization, to obliterate the frontiers of the period of partition.

Although, because of the stern state direction and some state encroachments,[27] sometimes serious tensions existed between Church and government, ecclesiastical life was able to develop fully. The Church's greatest efficacy appeared especially in public life. Poland presented itself as an expressly Catholic country. But the inner life of the Church also flourished. From 1918 to 1939 the number of bishops increased from 23 to 51, the number of priests to 12,940 (43 percent), the number of religious priests to 16,663 (62 percent), that of lay brothers to 4,567, that of female religious to 16,820, that of religious houses to 2,027. Ecclesiastical congresses,[28] great pilgrimages, Catholic associations and organizations,[29] intensive parochial care of souls,[30] new synodal laws, a greatly improved Catholic press, basic theological instruction in seminaries and on Catholic theological faculties,[31] general Catholic education and the Catholic University of Lublin,[32] founded in 1918, deepened the faith decisively. But this did not prevent the Polish episcopate from energetically Latinizing[33] the strong Uniate Ukrainian Church.[34]

---

[25] Cf. K. Blaszczyński, Concordatum cum Republica Polonia (Warsaw 1925); A. Systerhenn, Das polnische Konkordat vom 10. Februar 1925 (Cologne 1925); F. Grübel, Die Rechtslage der römisch-katholischen Kirche in Polen nach dem Konkordat vom 10. Februar 1925 (Leipzig 1930).

[26] AAS 17(1925), 521–28.

[27] In 1935 the so-called Wawel Conflict; in 1938 actions of expropriation and destruction against Orthodox in Lublin; cf. B. Spuler, "Die orthodoxe Kirche in Polen," Osteuropa-Handbuch, Polen, ed. by W. Markert (Cologne and Graz 1959), 114–18.

[28] In 1927 the Eucharistic Congress in Poznan; in 1937 the Congress of Christ the King in Poznan.

[29] Among them, Catholic Action with 621,820 members.

[30] There were 1,172 new parishes.

[31] Warsaw, Cracow, Lvov, Vilna.

[32] Cf. Kniega jubileuszowa 50-lecia Katolickiego Uniwersytetu Lubelskiego, praca zbiorowa (Lublin 1969); A. Petrani, op. cit.

[33] Cf. H. Koch, "Die unierte Kirche in Polen," Osteuropa-Handbuch, ed. by W. Markert (Cologne and Graz 1959), 109–13.

[34] It had in 1932 2,371 parishes, 2,654 priests, and 192 male religious.

On 1 September 1939 Poland was attacked by Germany and, seventeen days later, by the Soviet Union. Poland soon succumbed to superior strength and was again partitioned. Its western areas were for the most part allotted to Germany with 16.9 million Catholics—80.8 percent of all the Catholics. The southern part and the remainder of Poland was made a sort of German colony as the Gouvernement General, while the Soviet Union incorporated the eastern areas of Poland, which in the course of the Second World War also came under German occupation from 1941 to 1944–45. The inclusion of the eastern parts of Poland in the Soviet Union (1939–41) produced a brutal persecution of the Church. But also in the areas occupied by Germany the fate of the Polish Catholics was unbearable. Nazi directives deprived the Church of its liberty and almost outlawed it, the clergy was decimated, a great part of the bishops and priests were arrested and taken to concentration camps, all associations and organizations were forbidden, and worship was restricted to a minimum. At the end of the war the Church in Poland had to lament the death of 4 bishops, 1,996 priests, including the Blessed Maximilian Kolbe, 113 clerics, and 238 female religious. A total of 3,647 priests, 389 clerics, 341 lay brothers, and 1,117 sisters were confined in concentration camps. The Holy See, which had very sharply condemned the partition of Poland and the oppression of the Polish Catholics, could not help the afflicted Church.

The restoration of the Polish state on 5 July 1945, in which Poland had been compensated for its eastern areas that had been annexed by the Soviet Union with the eastern areas of Germany as far as the Oder-Neisse line, brought the Church only a temporary relief. For soon there began also in Poland, with the aid of the Soviet occupation, the setting up of a Communist political system. On 16 September 1945 the new Polish government denounced the concordat. But first the Church had to tackle the rapid restoration of church administration and of religious life because of the vast losses in the war and the great territorial changes. This was facilitated by the fact that in 1945 Poland was reduced in size by about one-fifth, but the proportion of the Catholic population—especially through the replacing of the expelled Germans, who were partly Protestants, by Catholic Poles from the eastern areas—grew to 97.8 percent. On 15 August 1945 Cardinal Primate August Hlond erected five apostolic administrations in the formerly German eastern areas. Religious life could again develop. However, the original religious toleration of the state was supplanted by a latent attitude of hostility to the Church. Between 1946 and 1948 the government tried to drive the Church's activity out of public life into the area of the sacred. Severe measures of curtailment affected especially Catholic education, the pastoral care of youth, and the Catholic cultural and educational system. Also an effort was undertaken to split the clergy[35] by the creation of a national Church. The struggle against the Church erupted openly in 1951. An abundance of administrative measures affected the Church, such as the dissolution of all ecclesiastical organizations, except that of charity, the secularization of church schools, hospitals, and orphanages, and the expropriation of church property. The episcopate was forced to conclude an agreement[36] with the government on 14 April 1950. While the Church renounced its land and promised its help in the integrating of the new western areas, the state guaranteed a minimum of church activity.

The state did not observe the agreement. The government placed men of its confidence as vicars capitular in the apostolic administrations, displayed a propaganda campaign, and further persecuted the Church. Many bishops, including Primate Stefan Wyszyński, and hundreds of priests were imprisoned, while the collaborating "patriotic priests" obtained key positions. The number of male religious houses dropped ca. 40 percent, that of female houses ca. 45 percent. The number of diocesan priests sank from 8,624 in 1945 to 2,247 in 1953. A decisive ecclesiopolitical change did not occur until October 1956, when the Polish Communist party abandoned the former Stalinist course and entrusted the direction of the state to the moderate Wladyslaw Gomulka. He ended the imprisonment of Wyszyński and the priests and on 7 December 1956 concluded a new agreement[37] with the Church, which essentially guaranteed the Church activity agreed to in the previous treaty, even if still more curtailed. This time the government kept its word. New vicars general could be installed in the administrations, and church life could again develop, even if modestly. Renewed tensions between state and Church appeared only in isolation, as on the occasion of the message of reconciliation of the Polish episcopate to the German Catholics on 18 November 1965[38] and of the millennium celebration of the conversion of Poland in 1966.

Paul VI, who would have liked to visit Poland, accommodated Polish desires in the context of his Eastern policy. In 1971 he beatified Maximilian Kolbe, and, after the German Federal Republic had signed the Treaty of Warsaw on 7 December 1970, he took up the reorganization of Poland's western territories on 28 June 1972. The previous apostolic administrators became diocesan bishops, three new sees were erected, and German ecclesiastical jurisdictions, that is, dioceses, were separated from the Polish western territories.[39] Thereby the Polish western lands became autonomous in canon law.

---

[35] "Pax" or "Patriot Priests' Group."

[36] Text in Ostprobleme 2(1950), 469ff.

[37] Text ibid., 9(1957), 237.

[38] Cf. Versöhnung oder Hass? Der Briefwechsel der Bischöfe Polens und Deutschlands und seine Folgen. Eine Dokumentation mit einer Einführung von O. B. Roegele (Osnabrück 1966).

The contacts and negotiations between the Vatican and the Polish government were not thereafter interrupted. This all the more, because Polish Catholicism with its uncrushed vitality has remained an unmistakable element of the Polish people. In 1965 the Church in Poland had more than 27.1 million mostly very zealous and practicing faithful, more than 6,699 parishes, 14,420 diocesan and 3,408 religious priests, 4,994 religious brothers, 25,472 sisters, and 3,027 religious houses. In 1974 the number of bishops was 77, the number of candidates for the priesthood 4,200. Nonetheless, the possibility of development of the Church in Poland, as Cardinal Primate Wyszyński assured the Roman Synod of Bishops in 1974, remains restricted, as earlier.[40]

Czechoslovakia

When on 28 October 1918 the Republic of Czechoslovakia, with 140,546 square kilometers and 13.6 million inhabitants, of whom 95 percent were Catholics, was constituted out of territories of the crumbled Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, the situation of the Church in the new state began to appear quite complicated and difficult. A nationalistic and anticlerical Czech ruling class acquired power. The anti-Roman, nationalistic tendencies which for decades had grown in the Czech clergy under the direction of the Jednota society and now peaked in the powerful and, especially among Czech intellectuals, very popular Away-from-Rome movement,[41] first led to serious conflicts within the Church, and then on 8 January 1920 the proclaiming of the Czech National Church.[42] This and other Protestant religious communities, as well as Orthodoxy in the Carpatho-Ukraine that belonged to the republic, soon experienced the widest spread through massive state support.[43]

---

[39] Cf. H. Stehle, "Der Vatikan und die Oder-Neisse Linie," Europa-Archiv 27(1972), 559–66.

[40] Cf. S. Lammich, "Die Rechtsstellung der römisch-katholischen Kirche in der Volksrepublik Polen," Österreichisches Archiv für Kirchenrecht 23(1972), 3–15.

[41] Cf. P. Mai, "Die Tschechische Nation und die Los-von-Rom-Bewegung," Beiträge zur ostdeutschen und osteuropäischen Kirchengeschichte. Festschrift Bernhard Stasiewski (Cologne and Vienna 1975), 171–85.

[42] Cirkev Československá, since 1971 Cirkev Československá husitska.

[43] The census of 1930 gave, in a population of 14.7 million, besides 10.8 million Catholics, 585,041 Uniates, and 356,838 Jews, 1.1 million Protestants, 145,598 Orthodox, 854,638 of no denomination, and 739,385 members of the Czechoslovak National Church.

In addition, the government prepared to adapt the church organization, which now consisted of two archdioceses and ten bishoprics, to national interests and to approximate the diocesan boundaries to the national frontiers. In November 1918 Archbishop Count Paul Huyn had to leave Prague, and in 1919 four bishops in Slovakia had also to resign or were deported to Hungary. In order to put pressure on the Church, the state on 11 August 1919 sequestered 251,925 cadastral yokes (ca. 126,000 hectares) of church property in Slovakia. Various church schools were secularized, and especially by means of the Sokol Unions a massive nationalistic anticlerical propaganda was promoted.

The Holy See, which had taken up diplomatic relations with Czechoslovakia as early as October 1919, tried by all means to stop the exodus from the Church and to normalize the situation. In accord with the desires of both sides, there soon began diplomatic negotiations, which proved to be difficult. As a mark of his willingness to accommodate, on 16 December 1920 Benedict XV appointed three Slovaks to the local sees under the assumption that two of their predecessors, who had had to emigrate to Hungary, would be provided for by Czechoslovakia. Although the Czechoslovak ambassador to the Holy See, Kamill Krofta, guaranteed this in writing in the name of his government, the promise was not kept. This was the reason why the Vatican later, in the carrying out of the so-called Modus vivendi, made its concessions dependent on the previous settlement of the material questions.

After long negotiations the apostolic administration of Trnava in Slovakia was erected and a titular bishop placed at its head. However, the see of Rožnava remained vacant from 1920, for the Czechoslovak government intended to dissolve it because of is Hungarian majority and integrate it into a new Slovak metropolitanate that was to be established. Relations between state and Church noticeably deteriorated. When, before the approaching parliamentary elections, the Slovak bishops on 26 November 1924 in a common pastoral letter, with which the Czech bishops declared their solidarity, urged the faithful to hold themselves aloof from all parties that were hostile to the Church and religion and refused Communion to the members of radical parties, the state pressure increased. Trials were instituted against priests, church feasts were abolished, new anticlerical laws were enacted, and on the occasion of the celebration to honor Hus in 1925 the nuncio was forced to leave. But the government soon had to yield because of the domestic and foreign policy conditions. In the summer of 1927 the government promised to permit the Catholic Popular party, to restore Catholic schools, and to regularize the sequestered church property. The negotiations led on 17 December 1927 to a Modus vivendi.[44] In this were agreed: the imminent assimilation of diocesan boundaries with the political frontiers of the nation, the restitution and the administration of the sequestered church property by an episcopal commission, the autonomy of the religious orders, and the free nomination of bishops by the Holy See, subject to the state's right of veto. And the interrupted diplomatic relations between the Vatican and Czechoslovakia were restored.

But the implementation of the Modus vivendi foundered on the objections of Czechoslovakia to undertaking the restoration of church property before the rearrangement of diocesan boundaries. Thereupon the Hungarian government sequestered the property of the Slovak dioceses that lay in Hungary, and Cardinal Primate Jusztinián Serédi introduced a suit at the International Court at The Hague. This led again to further tensions in the relations between the Vatican and Prague, which were made worse by the forced resignation of Archbishop František Kordač.[45] The nuncio Pietro Ciriaci was attacked, excluded from the discussions, and hence recalled in November 1933. But the government yielded again before the parliamentary elections of 1935. This time the negotiations led to the restitution of the sequestered church property, whereupon Pius XI issued the bull Ad ecclesiastici regiminis of 2 September 1937.[46] The boundaries of the Slovak sees were assimilated to the national frontiers, the dioceses and the two administrations—Trnava of 1922 and Satu Mare of 1930—were separated from the Hungarian diocesan organization and placed directly under the Holy See. Furthermore, the Pope promised the erecting of two new metropolitanates, one in Slovakia and one in Carpatho-Ukraine.[47]

Meanwhile, the expansion of the Third Reich not only caused the destruction of Czechoslovakia,[48] but led in the areas occupied by

---

[44] AAS 20(1928), 65f.

[45] A. K. Huber, "Franz Kordačs Briefe ins Germanikum (1879–1916)," Archiv für Kirchengeschichte von Böhmen, Mähren, Schlesien 1(1967), 62–184; F. Lorenz, "Ein Presse-Fall in der katholischen Kirche im Jahre 1931. Erkenntnisse aus der Affaire Kordač-Ciriaci," Kirche, Recht und Land. Festschrift zum 70. Lebenjahr von Weihbischof Prof. Dr. A. Kindermann (Königstein and Munich 1969), 194–210.

[46] AAS 29(1937), 366–69.

[47] When after the Vienna Award of 2 November 1938 important parts of Slovakia again became Hungarian, and Hungary also occupied the Carpatho-Ukraine, the bull Dioecesium fines of 19 July 1939 (not in the AAS) again subordinated the dioceses in these territories to the previous Hungarian metropolitan sees; the earlier situation persisted until 1945.

[48] On 6 October 1938 the republic first became a federation, then on 4 March 1939 Slovakia became an independent republic, but on 16 March 1939 Bohemia-Moravia became a Reichsprotektorat.

Germany to a real struggle against the Church. Ecclesiastical administration, press, and organizations were restricted, and hundreds of priests were imprisoned. Most sees remained vacant. The situation of the Church was normal only in the Slovak Republic, at whose head was the Catholic priest Josef Tiso. Here there were difficulties only with the Uniates of the dioceses of Prešov and Mukačevo, since, because of massive state pressure, their number greatly declined by 60,000 in favor of the Orthodox.

In spite of the political and economic difficulties, the lack of priests, and an antiecclesiastical propaganda, the Church was able to revive in Czechoslovakia in the postwar years, in many areas even develop anew. A vigorous renewal took place especially in the school system and the press and among the religious orders and associations. Great meetings, congresses,[49] and celebrations strengthened Catholic self-consciousness.

On 9 May 1945, after the Second World War, there emerged with the support of the Soviet occupation the Czechoslovak People's Democratic Republic. The former political boundaries could be restored, apart from the Transcarpathian district, which was ceded to the Soviet Union. The country now included 127,869 square kilometers, with ca. 13 million inhabitants. On 25 February 1948 by means of a coup d'état the Communist party obtained power, which began at once with the establishing of a Communist state system. The hierarchy,[50] just established, and the reviving religious life, which had at first, however, suffered a harsh setback through the expulsion of hundreds of thousands of Catholics of German and Hungarian nationality, were paralyzed. The apostolic internuncio, Xaver Ritter, was expelled from the country. A series of administrative measures deprived the Church of its rights and its possibilities in the apostolate. Catholic schools, all seminaries and religious orders, organizations and societies, and the Catholic press were suppressed, religious instruction in the schools was ever more curtailed, the clergy was split by a pro-Communist Priests' Peace Movement, headed by Josef Plojhar, and the leading ecclesiastical personalities, bishops, including Josef Beran, were condemned in show trials to long prison terms. On 14 October 1949 the state Department of Churches assumed full control of the Church. On 28 April 1950 the Uniate see of Prešov was transferred to the obedience of the Orthodoxy of Moscow.[51] However, neither the clergy nor the faithful complied with this return, but as soon as circumstances allowed the Uniate diocese was reestablished. It is again permitted (since 13 June 1968) and numbers ca. 120,000 faithful.[52]

---

[49] In 1929 the Eastern Congress in Prague; in 1936 the Catholic Congress in Prague.

[50] Josef Beran became archbishop of Prague in 1946, Josef Matocha, archbishop of Olmütz.

[51] Cf. R. Urban, op. cit., 111–17.

Negotiations between the Vatican and Czechoslovakia, which began in the course of the Church's new Eastern policy because of the changed political situation, led in the early 1960s to a slight relaxing of tension. In 1962–63 four bishops were able to take part in the Second Vatican Council, in 1965 Cardinal Beran was exiled, two seminaries could be opened, and, fostered by the political change of climate,[53] several bishops and priests were reinstated. After the military occupation of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet Union and the states of the Eastern bloc on 21 August 1968, however, the situation of the Church significantly worsened. Neither new discussions nor new appointments of bishops in 1973 could stop this. The Church suffers, among other things, also from a lack of priests. For the number of priests fell from 7,330 in 1948 to 3,100 in 1967.

Hungary

The military defeat of the Central Powers and the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy let loose an internal political chaos in Hungary at the end of October 1918, which climaxed on 16 November 1918 in the proclamation of the republic and on 21 March 1919 in the constituting of a Communist Soviet Republic. It opened a new chapter in the history of Hungary and its Church. On the basis of a new constitution, issued on the model of that of Soviet Russia, the state was separated from the Church. This meant the secularization of all Church property—114,700,000 crowns in cash and 639,000 cadastral yokes, that is, ca. 320,000 hectares—and of the Catholic school system—almost 3,000 schools of every sort. A ruthless dictatorship pursued the openly proclaimed goal: the total annihilation of the Churches. Religious instruction was everywhere forbidden, most church institutions, monasteries, and episcopal residences were confiscated and plundered, and seventeen of the faithful, including nine priests and one sister, were executed for their loyalty to the Church. When on 1 August 1919, after a reign of terror of 133 days, the Soviet Republic collapsed because of the invasion of Rumanian troops, bleeding Hungary, occupied by Serbs, Rumanians, and Czechs, except for a small remnant, could think only of a "Christian course" in its reconstruction.[54]

---

[52] Ibid., 115–16.

[53] So-called Dubček Era or Prague Spring of 1968.

[54] Cf. S. Jankovics, "Az egyház a tanácskönztársaság idején" (The Church in the Period of the Soviet Republic), Katholikus Szemle 21, 1–4 (Rome 1969), 15–24, 121–31, 234–42, 346–56.

The kingdom was restored, and all laws of the Soviet republic were annulled. The new Hungarian government was under the administration of the royal representative, Miklós Horthy (1920–44), on the basis of a constructive cooperation with the Christian religious communities, especially of the Catholic Church. A decree of the Council of Ministers renounced the exercise of the royal right of patronage, but later the government secured for itself the customary political right of veto. There existed between Church and state a very good relationship, which helped the Church to develop fully its efforts for renewal. The governments saw in the Church a dependable ally, and they were concerned for the Church's restoration and even for its growth. And in 1920 diplomatic relations were established between the Holy See and Hungary.

By the Treaty of Trianon of 4 June 1920, Hungary lost two-thirds of its earlier national territory and one-third of its own population. To the new state were left 92,963 square kilometers, with 7.6 million inhabitants, of whom 5.2 million (66.1 percent) were Catholics, 1.6 million (21 percent) Calvinists, 497,000 (6.2 percent) Lutherans, and 473,000 (5.9 percent) Jews. The new frontiers corresponded neither to the ethnographic nor the previous ecclesiastical boundaries. Of the twenty-six dioceses, not counting Croatia-Slovenia, only four remained entirely unimpaired. Six bishoprics retained their sees in Hungary, but lost a great part of their territories. Now the episcopal sees of seven bishoprics belonged to neighboring states, but still retained areas in Hungary. Nine dioceses were completely separated from Hungary. Because of the new territorial frontiers, the Hungarian Church lost almost half of all its property—ca. 336,100 hectares.

Because of the loss of church property, which had especially hurt the archbishopric of Esztergom, because of the impeding of the jurisdiction of Hungarian bishops in the parts detached from their dioceses, because of the removal of Hungarian bishops from their local offices, on account of the organizational ecclesiastical independence of the detached areas, and on account of the nationalistic policy of the successor states, there arose several controversies between the Hungarian episcopate and the neighboring states, which were settled in the diplomatic manner by means of the Vatican and the governments. The complicated ecclesiopolitical situation was still further complicated by the first and second Vienna awards of 2 November 1938 and 30 August 1940 as well as by the occupation of the Carpatho-Ukraine and northern Yugoslavia by Hungary, since areas earlier detached, with some 4.5 million Catholics, returned to Hungary. Hungary lost them again in 1944–1945.

In spite of its doubtful economic situation, the Church was able energetically to renew itself. Of course, politically this was conditioned by the preceding tragic years of war and revolution and the impact of the Treaty of Trianon, which produced the consolidation of the conservative forces and an alliance with the Church. Besides, in Hungary there was no Catholic answer to the Enlightenment, Josephinism, and liberalism. Thus the Catholic renewal came, long delayed, only after the turn of the century, but then, accelerated by external events, it was all the more stormy in appearance. Under the leadership of Cardinals-Primate János Csernoch (1912–27) and Jusztinián Serédi (1927–45) there appeared apostolic bishops—Gusztáv Majláth, Gyula Glattfelder, Tihamér Tóth, and others—among them the most outstanding personality of Hungarian Catholicism since Cardinal-Primate Péter Pázmány (d. 1637), Ottokár Prohászka (1858–1927).[55] The imposing Catholic renaissance was connected with the revival of the religious orders, the origin of a notable Catholic press, the complete renewal of the Catholic intellectual life and of the Catholic school system, and the establishing of many important societies and organizations.[56] The Hungarian Catholic Days, the anniversary celebration of Saint Emeric in 1930, and the Thirty-Fourth International Eucharistic Congress at Budapest in 1938 gave eloquent testimony to the inner renewal of Hungarian Catholicism.

However, the close relationship of the Church with the state proved to be detrimental when Hungary, in keeping with its revisionist policy, got caught in the wake of German National Socialism. It was hard for the Church to separate itself from the state. Hence it could only slowly display the struggle against National Socialism. However, with Nuncio Angelo Rotta and Primate Serédi in the lead, it subsequently did so decisively. It was due to the Hungarian episcopate and the Church that 10,000 Hungarian Jews could escape death during the German occupation (1944–45).[57]

The military occupation of Hungary by the Red Army on 4 April 1945 also produced substantial changes in the relations of state and Church. Hungary gradually became a Socialist People's Republic in 1949, in which the Communist Party acquired absolute power. The employment of the ecclesiopolitical principles of the Communist Party also came to full flower in Hungary. As early as April 1945 Nuncio Rotta had to leave the country. By means of an abundance of administrative measures from 1945 to 1950 the Church was deprived of all its property, its societies, its schools—3,344 of every sort—its institutions, the press—only twenty printeries—all religious orders—2,582 male and 8,956 female religious in 705 houses—and its freedom of movement. In an effort to divide the clergy, there arose in 1950 the so-called Priests' Peace Movement, a clerical collaboration with the state authorities. Cardinal Primate József Mindszenty (1945–74) and the episcopate, with the help of religious institutions and inner renewal, unsuccessfully led a defensive struggle. The power of the Church was broken, and its leading personalities were condemned in show trials to long imprisonment: Mindszenty[58] in 1949, Archbishop József Grösz in 1951. The Church was completely excluded from public life.

---

[55] Cf. A. Schütz, "Ottokar Prohaśzka. Ein grosser Bischof der Gegenwart," Hochland 28, 1(1930–31), 322–39.

[56] In 1937 there were 157 societies with more than one million members.

[57] Cf. also A. Meszlényi, A magyar katholikus egyház az emberi jogok védelmében (Achievements of the Hungarian Catholic Church for Human Rights) (Budapest 1947).

In 1950 an agreement[59] between state and Church was forced on the episcopate; it completely surrendered the Church to the system in return for trivial concessions by the state. Even the popular uprising of 1956 was unable to halt this process. Meanwhile, the Vatican's Eastern policy, introduced under the auspices of the international policy of a relaxation of tensions, made possible in 1964 the concluding of a partial accord between Hungary and the Holy See. Since then, on four occasions (1969, 1972, 1974, 1975) appointments to the Hungarian episcopate could take place. However, neither the exiling of Mindszenty in 1971 nor his removal from office in 1974 nor the appointments of bishops and other efforts of the Holy See were able to impede or suspend the further consistent implementation of the Communist religious policy in Hungary.

Rumania

At the end of the First World War the Kingdom of Rumania doubled its territory by means of the incorporation of Bessarabia, Transylvania, great parts of the Banat, eastern Hungary, and Bukovina. Hence in 1919 it grew to 295,049 square kilometers and had 14.6 million inhabitants, the majority of whom—more than 70 percent—belonged to Orthodoxy. The previously religiously (Orthodox) and nationally (Rumanian) homogeneous Danube state became a heterogeneous kingdom with a diversity of national minorities and religious groups.

---

[58] Cf. G. Péterffy, Il cardinale Mindszenty. La vita e l'anima d'un martire (Rome 1949); N. Boer, Cardinal Mindszenty and the Implacable War of Communism against Religion and Spirit (London 1949); S. Mihalovics, Mindszenty, Ungarn, Europa. Ein Zeugenbericht (Karlsruhe 1949); N. Shuster, In Silence I Speak. The Story of Cardinal Mindszenty Today and of Hungary's "New Order," (New York 1956); J. Vecsey, ed., Kardinal Mindszenty. Beiträge zu seinem siebzigsten Geburtstag (Würzburg 1972).

[59] Text in E. András, J. Morel, Bilanz des ungarischen Katholizismus (Munich 1969), 83–85.

For, among other things, 1.6 million Hungarians and 2.5 million Catholics, including ca. 1.4 million Uniates, were awarded to Rumania by the Treaty of Trianon of 4 June 1920. With the new political frontiers, five entire dioceses and parts of three others came under Rumanian rule. In view of the fact that the union of all Rumanians in a great national state had been advocated by Orthodoxy for decades, and also that Rumanian Orthodoxy regarded the Roman Catholic Church as foreign, since its faithful were predominantly German or Hungarian, and, on the other hand, the Rumanian Uniates as traitors, there fell to Orthodoxy in the state leadership, as in Yugoslavia, a dominating role and an intransigent attitude. Hence, Rumanian ecclesiastical policy, striving for national and religious unity, was directed against the national minorities and against Catholics. This was clearly expressed also in the constitution of 28 March 1923, since paragraph 22, in opposition to the Treaty of Paris in regard to protection of national minorities, which had been signed on 9 December 1919, declared Rumanian Orthodoxy the "dominant religion," granted precedence to the Rumanian Uniates over other religious groups, and designated both as "Rumanian Churches."[60]

The Catholic Church in Transylvania, where the change of sovereignty often degenerated into acts of violence against the Church, soon lost its property—277,645 cadastral yokes, ca. 140,000 hectares—through the unilateral land reform and a great number of its schools and boarding schools through new school laws. Conversions to Orthodoxy were encouraged by state means. Their number grew in the former Hungarian territories from 1,803,257 in 1910 to 2,086,097 in 1927. When in 1923 Bishop Gyula Glattfelder of Timisoara protested against the church policy measures, he had to leave Rumania and transfer his episcopal see to Szeged in Hungary. In vain Bishop Gusztáv Majláth of Transylvania also protested in the Senate at Bucharest in 1923 and in 1925 before the League of Nations at Geneva.

The Holy See, which had established diplomatic relations with Rumania in 1920, soon recognized that the continued existence of the Uniate Church and the assuring of the minimal rights of Roman Catholics were possible only with the support of the Rumanian Uniates and was ready, in order to achieve this goal, to abandon the interests of Roman Catholics of Hungarian and German nationality. The negotiations among Bucharest, the Vatican, and Budapest lasted for seven years and were very difficult, since at stake was the rearrangement of the Church's organization and of church property. In the framework of the rearrangement Bishop Raimund Netzhammer had to resign the see of Bucharest. The negotiations were concluded on 10 May 1927 with the signing of a concordat.[61] It was ratified on 7 July 1929 and implemented by the apostolic constitution Solemni Conventione[62] on 5 June 1930. It established a new Latin metropolitan see with four bishoprics, guaranteed to the bishops the free exercise of their office, recognized ecclesiastical institutions and religious orders as juridical persons; church schools could be founded, and a so-called patrimonium sacrum was to arise from the church property, enumerated by name. The Church conceded the usual right of veto in the appointing of bishops and accommodated the national desires of the government.

---

[60] Cf. N. Brinzeu, Cultele in Romania (Church Politics in Rumania) (Lugoj 1925).

Scarcely had the treaty been signed when the Rumanian Orthodox nationalists demanded the immediate dissolution and expropriation of the Transylvanian so-called status catholicus, the organ of the autonomous administration of the Transylvanian Catholics, since this still rich status was not enumerated in the property list. The negotiations, resumed between the Vatican and the Rumanian government, ended on 30 May 1932 with an accordo. The status and its rules were recognized under the proviso of state control. Meanwhile, the extremists continued their attacks and questioned the agreement because of its coming into being outside conformity with the constitution. Not until 2 March 1940 did a royal rescript ratify the accordo, after the property of the status, in the amount of 610 million lei, had been turned over to administration by the state.[63]

Between the two world wars Catholicism, despite all the difficulties, was able not only to maintain but also to renew itself. Inner religious life was especially deepened, but the Catholic press and social life could be vigorously improved. In 1932 the Roman Catholic Church counted 1.2 million faithful, 513 parishes, 898 priests, 200 male religious in 56 monasteries, and 1,432 sisters in 66 convents, while the Uniates had in 1,593 parishes 1,579 priests, in 8 monasteries 24 male religious, and in 11 convents 185 sisters.

After the Vienna Award of 30 August 1940 important parts of Transylvania were restored to Hungary, which reestablished there the earlier condition of the Church. Between the two peoples there occurred excesses, even in the ecclesiastical sphere. The end of the Second World War permitted Rumania to revive in its old frontiers, except for Bessarabia, which was incorporated into the Soviet Union.

---

[61] AAS 21(1929), 441–56.

[62] Ibid. 22(1930), 381–86.

[63] Cf. J. Scheffler, "A katholikus egyház jogi helyzete Romániában" (The Legal Status of the Catholic Church in Rumania), Notter-Emlékkönyv (Budapest 1941), 965–84; idem, "Az erdélyi Katholikus Státus küzdelmes husz éve" (Twenty Hard Years of the Catholic State in Transylvania), Magyar Szemle 40(1941), 299–310.

On 6 March 1945 a Communist government was imposed on the state; on 12 March 1948 it abolished the monarchy and proclaimed the People's Republic. It issued a Communist constitution on 24 September 1952. The concordat was repudiated on 17 July 1948, and on 4 August 1948 a so-called Law on Worship went into effect. In this the government recognized only two bishoprics—Alba Julia and Jassy—and considered the others as nonexistent. The dissolution of the Uniate Church was decreed on 2 December 1948, after a group of Uniate priests had decided to return to the Orthodox on 1 October 1948. The six Uniate bishops and all other bishops, including those who had been secretly ordained bishops by the nuncio before his expulsion, were arrested and condemned to long prison terms. The church administration was paralyzed, the religious orders were dissolved except for five houses, all Catholic schools and institutions were abolished, the Catholic press was forbidden. And the effort to establish a Rumanian National Church was undertaken.

Only gradually there occurred a relaxing of tensions. In 1955 the bishop of Alba Julia was released from prison but he remained under house arrest until 1967. In 1970 and 1971 he was allowed to travel to Rome and in 1971 he obtained a coadjutor with the right of succession. But neither the exertions of the Holy See in the course of its Eastern policy nor the visits of Rumanian Minister President Gheorge Maurer in 1968 and of the chairman of the Council of State Nicolae Ceausescu in 1973 to Paul VI could ease the harsh fate of the Catholics in Rumania.

Yugoslavia

The Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, called Yugoslavia since 3 October 1929, originated on 1 December 1918 through the union of the southern Slavic territories of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy with Serbia and Montenegro. The formation of the state took place, because of the military occupation of southern Hungary, not without acts of violence against the Catholic Church, and Cardinal Secretary of State Pietro Gasparri protested to Belgrade against them. The new state included 248,987 square kilometers, with a population of 12 million, a variety of nations and religious communities, including 5.5 million Orthodox, 4.7 million Catholics, and 1.3 million Muslims. The predominance of the Orthodox Serbs, who were establishing their own state, in comparison to the Catholic Croats and the unclarified legal status of the church organization[64] required a reorganization of the Church and the prompt clarification of relations of state and Church, all the more since the previous concordats with individual countries[65] had been annulled by the founding of the new kingdom.

---

[64] Only two of the ecclesiastical provinces remained in the old boundaries.

The preference for Orthodox Serbs in the administration of the state and the military, on the occasion of land reform and colonization, and in the distributing of state finances for religious communities, even though according to the constitution of 28 June 1921 all recognized religious communities were made equal, led to serious tensions between Church and state. On 23 July 1919 the Serbian school law of 1904, which recognized no church schools, was extended to all areas of the state. In this way the Church lost all its elementary and secondary schools. And twenty monasteries and 920 cadastral yokes (ca. 460 hectares) of church property were transferred to the state. Various religious societies, such as the Marian Congregations, were dissolved, and the youth in school were compelled to join the antireligious youth organization, Jugoslovenski Sokol. The bishops protested in vain against these measures in a common pastoral letter in 1923 and 1933. They accomplished only the opposite—the sharpening of the suppression. Hence the episcopal conferences in 1924 and 1925 proposed the concluding of a concordat.

As early as 1920 the Holy See sent a nuncio to Belgrade and was ready to conduct discussions on the diplomatic level. As a token of its good will, it erected the apostolic administrations of Banat in 1922 and Bačka in 1923, established the archbishopric of Belgrade in 1924, and made Skopje an exempt see in 1924. Thereby the Church had in Yugoslavia 4 archdioceses, 14 bishoprics, 2 apostolic administrations, 1,839 parishes, 3,109 priests, 1,409 male religious, of whom 941 were priests, and 3,754 sisters. The negotiations for the concordat were difficult. It was only on 25 July 1935 that an agreement was signed, after the state had already regulated its relations with the Orthodox in 1929, the Muslims in 1931, and the Protestants and Jews in 1933.

The concordat[66] guaranteed the reestablishing of the church organization, the free nomination of bishops by the Holy See, the free activity of the Church, church property, state subsidies, ecclesiastical celebration of marriages without a previous civil marriage, church associations and organizations, schools, and religious orders, in brief, the complete religious freedom of Catholics. For its part, the Holy See promised to elevate the apostolic administrations to bishoprics. Hence the concordat envisaged the equality of Catholics with the Orthodox.[67] Precisely for this reason, however, Orthodoxy under the leadership of Patriarch

---

[65] Latest on 24 July 1914 with Serbia.

[66] Not published in AAS because of nonratification; text in Mercati, vol. 2, 202–16; biblio. in Schöppe, 558.

[67] Cf. M. Lanovič, Konkordat Jugoslavije e Vaticanom (Yugoslavia's Concordat with the Vatican) (Belgrade 1935).

Varnava led a relentless fight against the agreement. When the Skupština (House of Delegates) accepted the concordat on 23 July 1937, the Holy Synod of Yugoslavia excommunicated all Orthodox members of the government and of parliament who had voted for the acceptance. Hence Minister President Milan Stojadinović did not submit the concordat to the Senate at all, but removed it from the agenda and informed the Synod that in new negotiations with the Vatican the patriarchate would first be consulted. In this way a concordat in Yugoslavia was made dependent on Orthodoxy, that is, forever excluded. However, as a consequence of the domestic and foreign policy situation, the spirit of the concordat could be realized. Church life flowered. Especially in the press, education, the societies, the care of souls, and the religious orders a rise was noticeable.

The Second World War was an especially severe blow to the Church. From 27 March 1941 Yugoslavia was occupied by German and Italian troops. Croatia declared itself an independent kingdom (1941–45), but in reality it was a satellite state dependent on the Axis Powers. There the government was very accommodating to the Catholic Church, but it often compelled it to collaborate and involved it in the bloody conflicts of the Croatian Ustaza and the Serbian partisan bands. These circumstances led at the war's end, on the occasion of the expulsion of the German population, to cruel acts of violence also against the Catholic Church. A pastoral letter of the bishops in 1945 bemoaned the murder of 243 priests and the plundering and destruction of many churches.[68]

After the Second World War, Yugoslavia became a federated Peoples' Republic on 29 November 1945, with the old political and diocesan boundaries.[69] Although the constitution of 31 January 1946, while separating state and Church, guaranteed liberty of conscience and religion, there soon occurred, as in the other neighboring socialist states, a massive persecution of the Church. Up to 1946 ca. 13 percent of the clergy were executed, ca. 50 percent were imprisoned, including Archbishop Aloysius Stepinač[70] of Zagreb. The Franciscan order alone had 139 victims. Catholic schools and organizations were liquidated, monasteries were for the most part dissolved, religious instruction and ecclesiastical activity were almost completely stopped, and a union of collaborating priests was founded to split the clergy. After a temporary relaxation following the break of President Josip Broz Tito with the Cominform in 1950 and after a new intensification of the situation by the elevation of Stepinač to the College of Cardinals in 1953, the papal nuncio was expelled. But the Church did not give in. On 23 September 1952 the bishops sent a letter of energetic protest to Tito and repeatedly told him that they were not empowered to conclude an agreement with the government.[71]

---

[68] Cf. V. Novak, Magnum Crimen. Pola vijeka klerikalizma u Hrvatskoj (Magnum Crimen. A Half-Century of Clericalism in Croatia) (Zagreb 1948).

[69] The state's area was expanded with 8,851 square kilometers in Istria and Dalmatia.

[70] Cf. H. O'Brien, Archbishop Stepinač, the Man and His Case (Westminister 1947); R. Pattee, The Case of Cardinal Aloysius Stepinač (Milwaukee 1953); cf. also the official presentation of Yugoslavia: The Case of Archbishop Stepinač (Washington 1947); also S. Simič, Vatikan protiv Jugoslavije (The Vatican against Yugoslavia) (Titograd 1958).

After the death of Cardinal Stepinač in 1960, the situation gradually relaxed. On 26 June 1964 the Holy See made direct contact with Yugoslavia. The discussions led on 26 June 1966 to an agreement,[72] which guaranteed the liberty of the Church but also affirmed the loyalty of the Church to Yugoslavia. Diplomatic relations were also restored between the Holy See and Yugoslavia. On 14 August 1970 an internuncio was sent to Belgrade. Indications of further relaxation were the raising of the apostolic administration of Bačka to a bishopric in 1968, the more extensive autonomy of the apostolic administration of Banat by the naming of a titular bishop in 1971, and in the same year Tito's visit to the Vatican. Despite some difficulties, the Church in Yugoslavia now enjoys a relative freedom of religion. This appears especially in the interior life of the Church. In 1961 the Church, despite serious losses, could again count 2,514 parishes, 2,462 diocesan and 1,145 religious priests, 1,491 brothers, 5,380 sisters, and 5,725,000 faithful. This favorable development continued in the following years. In 1974 there were in Yugoslavia 764 candidates for the priesthood, 2,817 male religious, of whom 1,728 were priests, 8,622 sisters, and 3,001 diocesan priests.[73]

Bulgaria

The Kingdom of Bulgaria came out of the Second Balkan War in 1913 and the First World War of 1914–18 diminished in size. It now had a total of only 103,146 square kilometers in area; 8,900 square kilometers of valuable territories, like access to the Aegean Sea, had been lost. The country counted in 1926 5.4 million inhabitants, of whom, however, only 45,491—.83 percent—were Catholics, among them 5,598 Uniates, who lived in one bishopric and one vicariate apostolic.

---

[71] Cf. W. de Vries, "Kirchenverfolgung in Jugoslawien," StdZ 146 (1949f.), 362–68; idem, "Die neue Welle der Religionsverfolgung in Jugoslawien," ibid. 151(1952f.), 442–51; K. S. Draganovič, "La Chiesa nella Repubblica Jugoslava," CivCatt 97/III (1946), 3–13, 318–24; 105/I (1954), 716–30; 105/II (1954), 105–20.

[72] Cf. HK 20(1966), 410f.

[73] Cf. the latest statistics and a summary in HK 31(1977), 318–24.

Eighty-four percent of the population belonged to Orthodoxy, 13 percent to Islam. The economically ruined country sought the revision of the unfavorable Treaty of Neuilly of 27 November 1919, but was visited by domestic and foreign policy difficulties. Despite this unhappy situation, the Church was still able to display a vigorous activity. Up to 1944 the number of faithful grew to 57,000. An apostolic exarchate for the Uniates could be established in 1926, and the Church ran more than 18 institutes, including 10 schools, 2 hospitals, and 6 orphanages. There resided at Sofia a representative of the Holy See as apostolic delegate without diplomatic character. From 1925 to 1934 he was Giuseppe Angelo Roncalli, later Pope John XXIII.

The Soviet occupation of Bulgaria on 9 September 1944 led on 15 September 1945 to the proclamation of the republic and on 15 October 1946 to the constituting of a People's Republic. A new constitution of 4 December 1947 and a law on worship of 17 February 1949 began the curtailing of religious freedom. Soon a ruthless persecution of the Church erupted. The Church lost all its organizations, institutes, bishops, and most of its priests and religious.

In the course of the gradual relaxation of tensions John XXIII was able in 1962 to welcome two Bulgarian bishops at the Second Vatican Council, and in 1968 Paul VI could receive a Bulgarian pilgrimage and in 1969 a delegation of the Bulgarian government at the Vatican. Mutual contacts have not been broken since then, but the situation of the Church in Bulgaria is unchanged.

Albania

Albania was able to reestablish its political sovereignty after the First World War, and it covered 27,538 square kilometers with 833,000 inhabitants. Of these, in 1929, 563,000 were Muslims, 181,051 Orthodox, and 88,739—10.6 percent—Catholics. The church organization was divided into 2 archdioceses, 3 dioceses, and 1 abbey nullius. There were 120 parishes, 143 diocesan and religious priests, 84 brothers, and 66 sisters. The country, which had to contend with backwardness and misery, acquired in the Catholic Church a special support, especially in charity and education. The Catholic mission, supported for decades by Italy, received an exceptional stimulus. Up to 1944 the number of religious grew to 321, of whom 116 were natives. The Italian missionary work was especially intensified from 1939, after Italian troops had occupied Albania on 7 April 1939 and had subordinated it to the Kingdom of Italy. In southern Albania there arose an apostolic administration, which was administered by the envoy of the Holy See residing in Albania from 1920, an apostolic delegate.

The Albanian war of resistance (1941–44) and the end of the German and Italian occupation gave the Albanian Communists the opportunity to erect a Communist political system[74] and completely to suppress the allegedly "colonizing" Catholic Church. All foreign missionaries, sisters, and the apostolic delegate were expelled, all ecclesiastical administrations and organizations were dissolved, all bishops, priests, and religious were shot, imprisoned, or scattered. An attempt was made in 1951 to found a national Church. Since Albania separated from the rest of the Eastern bloc states led by Moscow and, under the guidance of China, put itself in complete isolation, the Vatican was unable to make any contacts at all with it. In 1973 Albania proudly declared that it was the first socialist country to have closed the last church and extirpated religion.

[74] On 11 February 1946 Albania became a People's Republic.

CHAPTER 18

*The Church in The German-Speaking Countries

Germany

In the frenzy of national solidarity to which the peoples of Europe gave themselves as they moved against one another at the beginning of the First World War, the German Catholics were as much caught up as were other ideological groups. Just the forces which had stood sharply opposed, at least for a while, to the Empire's domestic policy overwhelmingly experienced the urge to show an undoubted profession to the German national state by the evidence of patriotic acceptance of sacrifices. This was true of the social democratic electorate no less than of the Catholic part of the population. And so there was a great attempt in the war effort to grasp at the opportunity to refute, once and for all, the accusation of a lack of loyalty to the Empire, hurled during the Kulturkampf. It was all the easier for the individual to accept the consequences of entering the war when the decision on war and peace was, according to Catholic political theory, so completely the responsibility of the rulers that its necessity or avoidability was not a subject of discussion for the simple citizen with his limited viewpoint. And while guiding principles of Catholic social doctrine in domestic policy caused distance and alternatives to political reality, the few general principles of the Church's ethics of war did not suffice in the field of foreign policy to give a critical judgment in the concrete case on the ultima ratio of the use of weapons. Thus there originated also the self-assurance with which Bishop Faulhaber of Speyer in 1915 declared the European conflict for the German side as the "academic example of a just war,"[1] more the inclination to premature identification than an exhaustive recognition of the facts.

---

* Ludwig Volk, S. J.

Compared with the lines of communication, which led from all episcopal sees of the orbis catholicus to the Vatican central office, the interrelationships among the national Catholicisms of Europe were only meagerly developed. This explains why a committee composed of prominent French laymen and prelates perceived so few restraints in supporting the antagonism of the warring parties in the ecclesiastical sphere also. Especially venomous was the impact of the attempt, undertaken in a polemical work,[2] to throw suspicion on the German Catholics of a diffused and global lack of loyalty to the faith. Naturally, those attacked defended themselves with a counterpublication.[3]

By means of a questionable attack a little later, the Belgian Cardinal Mercier threatened to involve the hierarchy in the dispute over the war. Concentrating entirely on the miseries of Belgium, which, without any provocation, had become the first victim of hostilities through the German invasion, the archbishop of Mechelen appeared to his German brothers in office to cooperate in setting up an episcopal tribunal.[4] He intended to free the Belgian civil population from the accusation of sniper warfare, hence from that accusation by which the German army command had sought to justify bloody reprisals in the first weeks of the war. Since Mercier at once publicized his project without any internal close contact, he caused the most serious embarrassment for those addressed. Only with difficulty was Cardinal Hartmann (1851–1919), since 1914 chairman of the Prussian episcopate, restrained from an equally public retort. Absolutely loyal to the Empire, even if without the political ambition of his predecessor Kopp, Hartmann hesitated between overcaution and inflexibility. In 1917–18 he displayed little foresightedness and sense of reality in his opposition to the elimination of the undemocratic three-class franchise in Prussia.[5] The fact that the spokesman of the Prussian bishops, in contrast to the other bishops, opposed an overdue constitutional reform weakened the power of conviction of a common pastoral letter of All Saints Day 1917, which sought to exorcise the revolutionary unrest in the underground.

---

[1] M. Faulhaber, Waffen des Lichts (Freiburg 1918), 132.

[2] Cf. A. Baudrillart, ed., La Guerre Allemande et le Catholicisme (Paris 1915).

[3] Cf. G. Pfeilschifter, ed., Deutsche Kultur, Katholizismus und Weltkrieg (Freiburg 1915).

[4] Cf. L. Volk, "Kardinal Mercier, der deutsche Episkopat und die Neutralitätspolitik Benedikts XV. 1914–1916." StdZ 192(1974), 611–30.

[5] Cf. R. Patemann, "Der deutsche Episkopat und das preussische Wahlrechtsproblem 1917/18," Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte 13(1965), 345–71.

Presented with a fait accompli in November 1918 through the military defeat and the proclamation of the republic, the Center party concentrated on giving full effect to its political weight in the national constituent assembly.[6] What the party accomplished in the discussions on the constitution, both constructively and as preventive measures, considerably surpassed what could be expected from its numerical strength.[7] If nevertheless the Fulda episcopal conference in November 1919 registered doubts, from the viewpoint of the Church's self-awareness, against individual items of the constitutional work, this concern for rights[8] was a precaution for possible future controversies, but not a criticism of what had been achieved at Weimar by the delegates of the Center.

In May 1917 Benedict XV had entrusted the Munich nunciature to Eugenio Pacelli, one of the most capable curial diplomats. He came as precursor of the Pope's work for peace, directed to all the warring leaders, but a personal visit of the nuncio to the imperial headquarters was unable to secure from the Germans the concessions which a further discussion of the project that had prospects of success would have required.[9] After the constitutions of the Reich and of the states had built political life on a republican plan, the nuncio faced a field of activity of vast extent. In the establishing of a nunciature for the Reich at Berlin, which Pacelli administered from Munich in a personal union from 1920 to 1925, and in the accreditation of the hitherto Prussian envoy, von Bergen, as ambassador of the Reich at the Holy See, there was reflected the importance which in Berlin was attributed to diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

The Foreign Office worked especially to have this developed in a concordat with the Reich in international law in the critical convulsions of the first postwar years, because it assured itself[10] of a consolidation, with the moral power of the Church, of the German frontiers in dispute in the east (Upper Silesia) and west (the Saarland). But the desire for a concordat that would apply to all German dioceses flagged when at the end of 1923 the period of political weakness had been overcome. For his part, Pacelli did not lose sight of the long-range goal of a concordat with the Reich, but at first he had to make certain of the state concordat with Bavaria,[11] planned as early as 1919. Well disposed to the Vatican's ideas of state and Church, but by no means uncritically opposing them, the cabinet posts held by the Bavarian Popular Party offered, from Pacelli's view, more favorable presuppositions for the creating of a "model concordat" than other state governments, in which the Catholic parties had a less strong position. If the nuncio hoped to gain from the Bavarian precedent a sort of norm, by which the readiness for concessions of future treaty partners would be measured, the agreeableness displayed by Bavaria in no sense acted as a stimulus, but rather consolidated the inclination against a concordat of the socialist, liberal, and Protestant groups. Only after protracted preliminary discussions was the treaty signed at Munich on 29 March 1924 and approved by the Landtag at the beginning of 1925.

---

[6] Cf. R. Morsey, Die deutsche Zentrumspartei 1917–1923 (Düsseldorf 1966), 163–245.

[7] For the content of the ecclesiastical articles of the Weimar Constitution cf. Bihlmeyer-Tüchle, 500.

[8] Printing of the announcement: L. Volk, ed., Akten Kardinal Michael von Faulhabers 1917–1945 Vol. I: 1917–1934 (Mainz 1975), 111f.

[9] On the Holy See's peace policy during World War I, cf. above, Chapter 3.

[10] Cf. L. Volk, Das Reichskonkordat vom 20. Juli 1933 (Mainz 1972), 1–24.

The collaboration of the bishops could not long evade the centralizing tendencies of the new state organization. The distinctly tribal consciousness of the Bavarian bishops opposed a merging of the conferences of Fulda and Freising, which had operated side by side, following an all-German prelude from 1867 to 1872, since the beginning of the Kulturkampf. Also, the autocratic rule which Cardinal Kopp had exercised over the Prussian episcopate was still vivid in memory. Thus in 1920 there first occurred a personal bridging of the episcopal main line, while each of the two conference chairmen was invited to the meetings of the sister conference. Without regard for regional preferences, the bishops in north and south were finally united in a single consultative community in 1933 by the Nazi totalitarianism that sought uniformity; within its framework, of course, the Freising conference continued to exist, and the West German episcopal conference was reorganized from 1934 in special meetings, mostly at Kevelaer.

The chairmen of the Bavarian episcopate, Michael von Faulhaber (1869–1952), since 1917 archbishop of Munich and Freising, had already acquired from Speyer, where he had worked as bishop from 1911, a reputation as a preacher of the faith and critic of the age of great stature. Of a princely appearance and from 1921 a cardinal, Faulhaber seemed destined by providence to step into the vacuum which the forced departure of the Wittelsbachs had created in the sensitivities of broad strata of the population.

From the baroque element in the appearance of the archbishop of Munich no connecting line led to the figure of Cardinal Adolf Bertram (1859–1945) of Breslau, a sober Lower Saxon. Bishop of Hildesheim in 1906, of Breslau in 1914, and cardinal in 1916, in 1920 he assumed the chairmanship of the Fulda episcopal conference. Conversant with law, worldy-wise, zealous, and extremely diligent, he proved to be the master of written memoranda to governmental officials on every level.

---

[11] For the course of the negotiations cf. G. Franz-Willing, Die bayerische Vatikangesandtschaft 1803–1934 (Munich 1965), 181–227.

The Catholics in the south and west of the Reich expressed their assent to the Weimar state neither unanimously nor with equal decisiveness.[12] How strongly their views diverged came to light in 1922 at the Munich Katholikentag in the sensational controversy between Cardinal Faulhaber and the president of the meeting, Adenauer.[13] Neither spoke for himself alone but for a considerable following, the one as spokesman of a royal Bavarian, the other as representative of a Rhenish democratic Catholicism. True, Faulhaber's harsh judgment was directed first at the revolution as such, but all later interpretations did not soften the thrust at the present reality of the republic.

One of the most significant gains, which the Catholic Church, along with all religious bodies, owed to the republican constitution was the exclusion of state influences in the bestowal of ecclesiastical offices. To regard this as progress was denied to the bishops so long as the constitutional law remained a dead letter, because the ministerial officials of individual German state governments opposed a stubborn resistance to the transforming of this constitutional norm into administrative practice. Cardinal Bertram and Nuncio Pacelli reacted in notably different ways to the ever clearer obstructionist tactics of Prussia, by far the single most powerful state, with 60 percent of the population of the Reich. While the chairman of the Fulda episcopal conference first aimed to see the constitutional point of departure restored before the granting by treaty of possibilities of hearing agencies in the appointment to church offices could be discussed, the nuncio was bound to the prospect of being able to move on to talk of a concordat even before the overdue liquidation of the Kulturkampf laws.

Prussia's willingness for a treaty, however, only made itself felt after the Bavarian model had stirred in Berlin the desire likewise to move up to the "concordat state." In regard to content, the Prussian concordat of 14 June 1929 could only lag behind the Bavarian model because of differently arranged parliamentary circumstances,[14] and with the renunciation of school regulations it became almost a torso, because it even lacked what from the Vatican's viewpoint only made a treaty with the Church really a concordat. Nevertheless, the positive yield was significant: the erecting of the see of Berlin, the elevation of Breslau and Paderborn to archepiscopal status with a new distribution of the suffragan sees, the participation of the Prussian cathedral chapter in the election of the bishop. The state of Baden followed with the concordat of 12 October 1932.

---

[12] On the route of the German Catholics from the Empire to the republic, cf. H. Lutz, Demokratie im Zwielicht (Munich 1963).

[13] Cf. Akten Kardinal Michael von Faulhabers (above, note 8) nos. 127–33.

[14] Cf. D. Golombek, Die politische Vorgeschichte des Preussenkonkordats (Mainz 1970).

In regard to cultural policy the 1920s were under the auspices of the conflicts over the Reich's school law demanded by the Weimar Constitution.[15] There had already been bitter struggles over the school article in the discussions of the constitution. They had the character of a compromise, and, despite several attempts, the Center Party did not succeed in putting through the equality of rank, prescribed by canon law for the denominational school, with the public school favored by the cultural and political Left.

The ideological oppositions broke out again over three drafts of laws submitted in the course of the years. Although the Catholic school organization sought to gather the advocates of the denominational school without regard for party boundaries, and in a campaign for signatures in 1922–23 some 75 percent of all Catholics qualified to vote opted for this type of school, this changed nothing in the majority situation in the Reichstag. Since the prospects for a Reich school law that would have partly corresponded to Catholic ideas thereby disappeared, the defenders of the denominational school finally turned entirely to the defensive under the slogan "Rather no Reich school law than a bad one."

In its beginnings an offshoot of the Popular Union for Catholic Germany, the Catholic school organization had experienced a steep ascent since 1913, while the Mönchen-Gladbach branch-enterprise fell into a crisis of existence.[16] After a maximum membership of more than 800,000 in 1914, the social, economic, and political upheavals of the war and postwar periods had so obstructed the Popular Union that in 1928 it counted only 400,000 members. After the Catholic association system in Germany had displayed, up to the beginning of the war, an amazing breadth, dynamism, and diversity, now the dark sides of the differentiation became perceptible. For the most part liable to subscription in several societies, the members first economized in times of need in what was unnecessary. Moreover, the superorganization favored a certain weariness of association. In the Mönchen-Gladbach case a lack of economic decisions and the struggle against a crippling mountain of debts did more than was needed to cause the glorious "Union of Unions" to become one of the first victims of Hitler's liquidation policy in mid-1933. Once on its way down current, the Popular Union foundered on the inability of its leaders to shape it beyond the socioethical goals of the time of foundation to the general Catholic union, a plan which, in view of the distribution of functions in the association sector that had meanwhile occurred, apparently had little chance in any case.

---

[15] Cf. G. Grünthal, Reichsschulgesetz und Zentrumspartei in der Weimarer Republik (Düsseldorf 1968).

[16] Cf. E. Ritter, Die katholisch-soziale Bewegung Deutschlands im 19. Jahrhundert und der Volksverein (Cologne 1954), 355–495.

The exemplar of "Catholic Action" was based on a quite similar idea, as it was preached by Pius XI cocksurely and emphatically. In 1928 Nuncio Pacelli was supposed to supply the initial kindling in an address at the Katholikentag in Magdeburg. If the response, despite the good will of the laity who were called to share in the hierarchical apostolate of the Church, as the official definition said, was not really satisfying, the principal reason was that the papal appeal outlined a program which was not only realized in a diversity of ways in the Catholic association life of Germany, but looked back to a long tradition and did not, as in most of the Latin countries, encounter an association-organizational vacuum. A stricter reference of the independent lay societies to the hierarchy would rightly be felt by these as a vexation and retrogression. Conversely the prospect was not unwelcome to some bishops of breaking the concentration of power of the superdiocesan central association by appeal to "Catholic Action." In fact, Catholic Action was never really able to get a foothold in Germany, and what was so called despite all failures did not go beyond a minimal exertion owed to the papal initiator.

Without ignoring the representation of legitimate church claims and interests among the Reich officials, and stressing the primacy of the pastoral in his understanding of his episcopal office, Cardinal Bertram respected the existing institutional distribution of competencies between the entire episcopate and the Catholic Center Party and Bavarian People's Party. He was thoroughly opposed to a competitive juxtaposition on the field of Church politics, before which his predecessor Kopp showed no dread at all. In any event, Bertram, by commission of his fellow bishops, internally occupied a position toward individual projects of laws to the extent that inner church interests were concerned, but for the rest the freedom of decision of the Catholic delegates was left intact, however much current ideas aspired to see in them mere agents of the executive power of the Church's leadership.[17]

On the outside the Church's closeness to the Catholic parties was manifested in a number of clerical bearers of mandates, the not entirely uncritically so-called Center prelates, who mostly belonged to the distinctive, even if not leading, minds of their parties but had to thank not their clerical status but their professional achievements. Pope Pius XI had fundamental reservations about the conflict-laden double commitment of pastoral care and party politics without abruptly cutting off the connections that had grown historically. In Germany the problem of interfering professional fields in the life of the nuncio's adviser and leader of the Center, Ludwig Kaas, became as evident as in Austria in the activity of the prelate Ignaz Seipel, who had risen to be chancellor.

---

[17] Cf. also R. Morsey, "Kirche und politische Parteien 1848/49," A. Rauscher ed., Kirche, Politik, Parteien (Cologne 1974), 19–56.

That the Weimar Constitution of 1919 was serious about the demand for equality, without distinction, of all citizens and thereby realized the points of the program to whose implementation the founders of the Center had earlier joined together, could not be without repercussions on the inner unity of the electoral body.[18] For with the demolition of the last vestiges of the Kulturkampf the previously attractive long-range goals had become pointless. As the conviction among Catholics loyal to the Church, formerly self-evident, of the indispensability of the Center constantly waned, it could be gathered from election statistics in consequence of which the proportion going over to the Center and the BVP in the votes cast between 1919 and 1933 dropped from 18 percent to 14 percent.[19] Between the loss in external recruiting power and the disappearance in inner cohesion existed a clear connection. Symptomatic of the strengthening of the centrifugal forces was the inability at the end of 1928 of the Center representatives to agree on a successor to Wilhelm Marx, who had resigned, as party chairman. For the first time in the history of the Center an ecclesiastic, the Trier prelate Ludwig Kaas (1881–1952), had to take the chairmanship in order to bridge the gulf between the wings.

Just as before, the Catholic parties could count on the indirect support of the episcopate in the form of electoral pastoral letters before critical votes. Not made use of sparingly enough, such episcopal appeals to Catholic cohesion concealed the danger of weakening the force of episcopal authority in case it needed to pronounce on ultimate ideological questions. The bishops felt themselves obliged to just this after the sudden increase of Hitler's National Socialist party to a mass movement of millions in 1930. One after another they underlined the incompatibility of Christianity and National Socialism in the spring of 1931.[20] The prohibition to join the Hitler movement was based on the racism and nationalism of his party, on the extravagance and malice of its agitation, on its violence against those who thought differently. In the daily papers the warnings of the German episcopate against National Socialism provoked an unusually more violent reaction than the directives[21] issued in 1921 in regard to atheistic socialism and based on the same principles.

---

[18] Cf. J. Becker, "Das Ende der Zentrumspartei und die Problematik des politischen Katholizismus in Deutschland," G. Jasper, Von Weimar zu Hitler 1930–1933 (Cologne 1968), 344–76.

[19] Cf. J. Schauff, Das Walhverhalten der deutschen Katholiken im Kaiserreich und in der Weimarer Republik (Mainz 1975).

With their authoritative refusal the bishops could influence Catholics who might be thinking of changing their vote, and this was proved when on 5 March 1933 Hitler "clearly obtained the least votes in the parts of the Reich that had a Catholic majority,"[22] but they could not prevent other strata of the population from turning to the Nazi movement. Not by accident did there occur with the agony of the Weimar state the outbreak of an intellectual current within German Catholicism, which under the collective term Reichsideologie produced an immense number of publications between 1929 and 1934, but remained almost exclusively confined to intellectual circles in its influence.[23] In the quest for a counterimage to the depressing political reality, authors of the most varied provenance came together in the attempt to revive the medieval notion of the Empire. In fact historically concealed illusionism, the concept was nonetheless in the process of exercising a considerable fascination on some contemporaries. It received religious impulses from the consecratio mundi, demanded at the same time by the liturgical movement. With the mutual institutional interpenetration of the original powers of state and Church the representatives of the Reichsideologie painted an image, the actualization of which had failed more than once in the history of Europe. This alone was not enough to destroy the counterfeit brilliance of the utopia, but the trend was too academic and elitist to influence the electoral process. This was the true measure of the actual political relevance of this movement and not the deluge of writings on the Reichsideologie. This applies to the period before as well as after Hitler's accession to power on 30 January 1933.

---

[20] Printing of the episcopal stand: B. Stasiewski, ed., Akten deutscher Bischöfe über die Lage der Kirche 1933–1945 Vol. I: 1933–1934 (Mainz 1968), Appendix nos. 5–7 and 11–13.

[21] For the suggestion relevant to the tasks of pastoral care in regard to antifaith unions, see W. Corsten, Sammlung kirchlicher Erlasse, Verordnungen und Bekanntmachungen für die Erzdiözese Köln (Cologne 1929), 619–24.

[22] R. Morsey (above n. 17), 31.

[23] Cf. K. Breuning, Die Vision des Reiches (Munich 1969), but with overemphasis on the political relevance.

Two decisions settled matters for the attitude of Catholics attached to the Church toward this event: the agreement of the Center to the Enabling Law on 23 March and the proclamation of the German episcopate, indirectly dependent on it, five days later.[24] Appealing to the assurances in Hitler's governmental declaration, the bishops conditionally withdrew their general prohibitions and warnings against the National Socialist Party. They took this step, not in an opportunist adaptation but with the purpose of sparing their flocks a worrisome test that was daily showing itself more sharply. This was done first in the conflict between loyalty to the Church and the obedience of the citizen, which became acute the moment when in Adolf Hitler a politician began to personify the authority of the government, who was at the same time leader of a party with an ideological appeal. In this dilemma the cautiously formulated position of the episcopate freed to that part of the German Catholics who wanted cooperation the way to collaboration, without however intending thereby to recommend Hitler's party.

In league with Vice-Chancellor von Papen (1879–1969), Hitler surprised the Vatican at the beginning of April 1933 with the offer of a concordat with the Reich. To the Church he promised the guarantee by treaty of the denominational schools, for his part he demanded, on the model of the Italian concordat, a prohibition on the clergy taking part in party politics. For a short time he was fascinated by the idea of dealing the Catholic parties a mortal blow by forcing the Church to withdraw all clerical office-holders; in the long view the advantages of a comprehensive regulation of the relations of state and Church seemed to be in his grasp. Franz von Papen's motives were more multifaceted. As a Catholic he wanted for the Church what he regarded as best. As a politician he speculated on his reputation as a successful protector of the Church's interests in order thereby to underpin the claim to represent the Catholic part of the population in Hitler's cabinet.

Around the vice-chancellor gathered the alliance "Cross and Eagle," a group inspired by the Reichsideologie, which had as its goal to build a bridge between the Catholic Church and the Nazi state. Taken with as little seriousness by the Nazi side as by the Catholic people, within a short time the Papen establishment was as isolated as was its protector in the cabinet. After the change of name to "Workers' Community of Catholic Germans," it was taken in tow even in its organization by the [24] On the redirection released by the Reichstag election of 5 March 1933, cf. L. Volk (above n. 10), 59–89. For some aspects of the much treated relations of Church and National Socialism, cf. D. Albrecht, ed., Katholische Kirche im Dritten Reich (Mainz 1976), with citations of the literature.

---

Nazi party in the fall of 1933. Numerically a tiny group, it disappeared from the scene a year later, after it had served its time as a pretense. In contrast to the Evangelical Church, in which the church organization broke into pieces over the opposition between Nazi "German Christians" and the denominational movement, the German Catholics avoided a self-destructive polarization, which enabled them to preserve their inner cohesion during the years of totalitarian oppression between 1933 and 1945.

In the summer of 1933 the revolutionary process of controlling everything in Germany outstripped the Roman negotiations for a concordat. When on 20 July the treaty[25] was signed at the Vatican, there were no longer any Catholic parties which the article on depoliticization, demanded by Hitler, could have injured. They had not fallen victim to any rule of the concordat but had been liquidated as had been the entire parliamentary system.

All the greater exertions were made by the Vatican negotiators to create by the concordat protection for the no less threatened Catholic associations. Accordingly, in addition to the assurance of existence for the denominational school, the guaranteeing of the Church's association system gained urgent present significance. As can be gathered from the layers of the article on the protection of the associations (ARTICLE 31), the offensive to bring everything under the control of the Nazi organization was stopped by these regulations of the concordat at an extremely critical time for the afflicted Catholic societies. What was thought of as a peace treaty changed unexpectedly into an instrument of defense. After the defeat of the frontal attack, the war against the denominational societies was continued with more subtle methods—despite the concordat. Not to belong to the pertinent Nazi organizations meant for the future a severe handicap for professional promotion and in some places also for social repute. By the prohibition of double membership Nazi organizations excluded members of Catholic associations from admission and hence from their special rights in order thereby to move them to abandon the ecclesiastical associations. Not all societies showed the same spirit of resistance. While the Catholic Teachers' Association capitulated as early as August 1933,[26] the association of Catholic German women teachers maintained itself in spite of all pressures until it was forcibly dissolved by the Gestapo in the autumn of 1937. From the summer of the same year on, the [25] For the content of the concordat, cf. Bihlmeyer-Tüchle III, 517–19; Schmidlin, PG IV, 164–66.

---

[26] Cf. H. Küppers, Der Katholische Lehrerverband in der Übergangszeit von der Weimarer Republik zur Hitler-Diktatur (Mainz 1975).

Catholic association of young men, especially annoying to the Nazi regime, was suppressed by the state police in one diocese after another.[27]

After the crushing of domestic political (parliamentary opposition) and inner party counterforces (the "Röhmputsch") and the death of President von Hindenburg on 2 August 1934, Hitler saw in the Christian churches the chief obstacle for a Nazi permeation of the entire population. With the help of a network of seemingly unconnected regulations the Nazi regime thus sought to drive every ecclesiastical influence out of public life. This became especially obvious in the gradual repression of Catholic journalism.[28] The first victim was the Church-oriented daily press. After 1933 Catholic papers could no longer be designated as such in the title, and in 1935 they were transformed into mere acclamation agents by a legally concealed decree of the propaganda ministry. To muzzle the Church's periodical system Propaganda Minister Goebbels made use of different methods. They extended from warnings through temporary prohibitions to the complete suppression of a periodical.[29] To this were added trivial prescriptions on the organization of the content in order to deprive the church publications of any attraction to readers and bring them into the odor of a musty religiosity. From 1936 pastoral letters could no longer be printed even in the diocesan newspapers protected in the concordat.

Especially malicious, because it aimed purposely to mislead, was the invention of the Auflagenachricht. Made obligatory by the propaganda ministry, it had to be accepted by Catholic papers without regard to its content and without its compulsory character being indicated or its being criticized. While all freedom was permitted to anticlerical agitation, gestures toward a counter-defense were answered with prompt sanctions. However, excess of power did not necessarily mean power of conviction. When in the summer of 1937 Goebbels made use of the morals trials of individual religious to mobilize his complete media potential for a week-long campaign against the Church, at the end it was not so much the credibility of the Catholic orders as that of the Nazi press that was in doubt.[30] Economic difficulties because of the war finally supplied the pretext in mid-1941 completely to silence the Church press, still strong in circulation, except for a handful of theological professional journals.

---

[27] Cf. B. Schellenberger, Katholische Jugend und Drittes Reich (Mainz 1975).

[28] Cf. K. A. Altmeyer, Katholische Presse unter NS-Diktatur (Berlin 1962).

[29] K. Gotto, Die Wochenzeitung Junge Front/Michael (Mainz 1970), describes an individual case as an example.

[30] Cf. H. G. Hockerts, Die Sittlichkeitsprozesse gegen katholische Ordensangehörige und Priester 1936/37 (Mainz 1971).

The Nazi authorities laid greater value on camouflage in their school policy[31] that directly contradicted the statements of the concordat of 1933. Decisive ministerial edicts were "not intended for publication." The certainly to be anticipated resistance of Catholic parents to the forcible introduction of the public school was neutralized by periodically staggered regional procedures, pseudovoting was interpreted for the result desired. Religious instruction had previously become an object of reform, its imparting was often removed from clerics and turned over to teaching personnel not authorized by the Church, who then reduced the number of hours provided for it. Schools of orders were compelled to close and entrusted to state or communal management.

On the government's part even the Reich Church Ministry, created in 1935, was unable to bring order into the chaos of competencies characteristic of the Hitler state. The reason was not because the church minister, Hanns Kerrl (1887–1941), was not powerful enough within the party to impose his will against more powerful rivals with ambitions in church policy. His office lacked a directly subordinate executive agent, whereas the lesser ranking Police Chief Himmler possessed in the Gestapo an instrument which he used in its proper perfection of power, without much concern for the church minister. Consequently it was not Kerrl who determined the course of the struggle for suppression of the Church, but his rivals, Himmler, Heydrich, Bormann, and Schirach, who for their part emulated one another in radical activity.

For the bishops the ideology, claims to power, and claims to domination of a totalitarian ideological state were as strange phenomena as for most contemporaries, so that they first had to find their way in the new reality. Against every encroachment of this political system in the Church's sphere Cardinal Bertram, as chairman of the entire episcopate, protested in writing with appeal to the legal situation, as he was accustomed to do and without letting himself be misled by the lack of results of his ideas. A chain of diplomatic notes[32] from the Holy See aimed in the same direction. The Vatican's protest against the disregard of the concordat left nothing to be desired in clarity and sharpness. Since it was in vain, in fact for the most part remained even without a reply, Pius XI finally broke his silence by denouncing the hostility of the Nazi regime before the whole world in the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge of March 1937.[33]

---

[31] Cf. R. Eilers, Die nationalsozialistische Schulpolitik (Cologne 1963) esp. 22–28 and 85–98.

[32] Cf. D. Albrecht, ed., Der Notenwechsel zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und der Deutschen Reichsregierung Vol. I: 1933–1937 (Mainz 1965), Vol. II: 1937–1945 (Mainz 1969).

[33] Cf. the definitive text in contrast to the preliminary draft of Cardinal Faulhaber in D. Albrecht, op. cit. Vol. I, 404–43.

Differing from the Pope, Cardinal Bertram could not then decide upon a departure from his policy of memoranda, when despite the best intentions its ineffectiveness could no longer be doubted. The bishop of Berlin, Preysing, demanded a revision of this defensive tactic as early as autumn 1937 but he could not put this over at Breslau.[34] After Hitler's passing to an expansionist foreign policy, introduced with the annexation of Austria in March 1938, the agitating pressure in domestic politics lessened temporarily, it is true, but the goal of gradually confining and finally destroying the Church was unchanged. It was carried further, with still more brutal harshness, after the outbreak of war in the fall of 1939 under the pretense of alleged war requirements.

With the elimination of the Catholic kindergartens, unilaterally decreed by the state's edict, the last hindrance to the total grasp of the rising generation fell. Unpopular priests were reprimanded by the Party or were sent without trial to the concentration camp at Dachau, where many succumbed to hardships or mistreatment.[35] Because he had not appeared to vote in the Reichstag elections in April 1938, Bishop Sproll of Rottenburg was expelled from his official headquarters by organized riots, removed from his diocese by the Gestapo, and only freed from exile by the collapse of the Nazi state.[36]

In 1940–41 the Gestapo undertook a raid in the grand manner when it arbitrarily confiscated by turns abbeys, religious houses, and seminaries and threw the occupants into the streets. At the same time the Nazi dictatorship, in the elimination of the emotionally ill, euphemistically called euthanasia, and in the deportation and murder of the European Jews pushed the perversion of the Reich to dimensions beyond the human power of conception. Nevertheless, Cardinal Bertram could not be moved from the policy of internal protest, which he unerringly continued. In his understanding of his office, determined by the experience of the Kulturkampf, the maintaining of the administration of the sacraments and of the parochial care of souls held absolute precedence over other episcopal duties, in the concrete case to publicly standing up for basic personal rights. The spokesmen of an energetic progressive defense did not intend the total break feared by the cardinal of Breslau with its devastating consequences. However, this was not the alternative to the policy of memoranda, disavowed by its total ineffectiveness. For the holders of power were by no means insensitive to the pressure of opinion of a great part of the population, which the exposure of the crimes of the regime would have had to produce. What they feared and the Church's members hoped from its bishops, the unique echo, appeared in the summer of 1941, which the three great sermons of Bishop Galen (1878–1946) of Münster against the violent domination of the Gestapo and the murdering of the emotionally ill elevated to an event of European rank.

---

[34] Cf. W. Adolph, Hirtenamt und Hitlerdiktatur (Berlin 1965).

[35] Cf. also R. Schnabel, Die Frommen in der Hölle (Frankfurt 1966); E. Weier, Die Geistlichen in Dachau sowie in anderen Konzentrationslagern und Gefängnissen (Mödling 1972). The statistics of the various authors are not uniform. According to the hitherto most comprehensive and basic listing in E. Weiler, pp. 75 and 82, 67 out of 304 German priest prisoners died at Dachau, and 18 out of 83 Austrian.

[36] Cf. P. Kopf, M. Miller, eds., Die Vertreibung von Bischof Joannes Baptista Sproll von Rottenburg 1938–1945 (Mainz 1971).

Differently from the action on euthanasia, which could not be hidden despite all efforts at camouflage, there came into view for the observer inside Germany only the last but one act of the "final solution of the Jewish question," forcible deportation, and even this only in a local sector. As early as 1935 the Fulda Episcopal Conference had united the assistance efforts of the Sankt Raphaelsverein and the German Charity Association in the "Assistance Committee for Catholic non-Aryans," but the boundaries of its success were very narrowly drawn through the restriction on the admittance of people from overseas.[37] A local center of gravity was constituted by the "Assistance Work in the Episcopal Ordinariate of Berlin," which Bishop Preysing had called into being. In the last common proclamation of the episcopate during the Nazi epoch, the Decalogue Pastoral Letter[38] of August 1943, which stressed the indivisibility of the right to life in all clarity, there was also unmistakable thought of "men of foreign races and descent." Of course, matters did not proceed as far as a public protest of the bishops against the annihilation of the Jews.

What fate was destined for the Church in the event of a victorious outcome of the war was demonstrated by Hitler's representatives in the territories annexed to the Reich in the West and East. After the Anschluss in March 1938 Austria was declared a territory freed from its concordat and in its ecclesiastical institutions abandoned to the forcible rule of the party functionaries. Austria, Lorraine, and in extremely radical fashion the Warthegau[39] supplied the negative proof for the protective influence which the concordat with the Reich, despite highly defective respect, produced to the end in the dioceses of the old Reich.

---

[37] Cf. L. E. Reutter, Katholische Kirche als Fluchthelfer im Dritten Reich (Recklinghausen 1971).

[38] Text in K. Hofmann, ed., Zeugnis und Kampf des deutschen Episkopats (Freiburg 1946), 75–84.

[39] Cf. B. Stasiewski, "Die Kirchenpolitik der Nationalsozialisten im Warthegau," Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte 7(1959), 46–74.

After the unconditional surrender on 8 May 1945, the victorious powers liquidated, with the rest of Hitler's rule, also the inner constitution of the German political system. In many places the Church was the single institution which was able to keep its personal identity beyond the zero hour. Its generally known spiritual opposition to National Socialism gave it, at least among the Western Allies and in the initial phase of the communal reorganization, a certain authority, but soon other influences gained the upper hand in the military governments of the four occupation zones.

In view of the unmistakable material misery the Church's efforts in the first postwar period were especially directed to charitable help.[40] The wretchedness moved to its climax with the stream of millions of refugees from the East, who, robbed of all they had, were driven from their ancestral homes. Arbitrarily drawn zone frontiers disrupted dioceses and carried the German partition into the ecclesiastical sphere. After Cardinal Bertram's death on 6 July 1945, a German vicar capitular, Ferdinand Piontek, functioned in Breslau, but a month later he was induced to resign by the determined Cardinal Hlond. As primate of Poland, the latter himself assumed the diocesan administration, so that, provided by the Holy See with the title of apostolic administrator, he could immediately send auxiliary bishops to the eastern areas of Germany now placed under Polish administration.

Under the chairmanship of the archbishop of Cologne, Josef Frings (b. 1887, archbishop in 1942, cardinal in 1946), the German bishops met at Fulda in August 1945 for their first postwar meeting. As previously against the violations of rights by the Nazi regime, they now protested for a nation without a voice at the Allied Control Council, against anarchy and arbitrariness, against the automatic interning of merely nominal party members, against the expulsion of millions of East Germans from house and farm. During the war years Pope Pius XII had maintained an intensive correspondence with many German bishops.[41] The Pope's voice was also the first which appealed on a world level for discretion and justice toward the defeated,[42] while the wave of hatred released by Hitler turned back in full fury on the Germans in their totality.

After the closing of all diplomatic representations in Berlin by the victorious powers, not excepting the apostolic nunciature, Pius XII left nothing untried to remain present, advising and helping, through an informal representation at least. Thus there originated the Vatican Mission at Kronberg near Frankfurt in late autumn 1945. From 1946 it was splendidly occupied by Aloysius Muench (1889–1962), an American bishop of German ancestry,[43] and became the germ cell of a revived representation of the Holy See in Germany, which was transferred to Bad Godesberg after the establishing of the Federal Republic in 1951 and was elevated to a nunciature.

---

[40] H. J. Wollasch, ed., Humanitäre Auslandshilfe für Deutschland nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg (Freiburg 1976).

[41] Cf. B. Schneider, ed., Die Briefe Pius' XII. an die deutschen Bischöfe 1939–1945 (Mainz 1966).

[42] Thus in the address to the College of Cardinals on 2 June 1945. Text in B. Wuestenberg, J. Zabkar, eds., Der Papst an die Deutschen (Frankfurt 1956), 103–10.

Population displacements of unprecedented size, introduced by Nazi resettlements and flight before bombs, climaxed in the influx of over 11 million expelled from their homeland, who, apart from the humanitarian needs, also created completely new problems of pastoral care. In some regions confessional boundaries, which had been more or less fixed since the Reformation, were shifted without plan and order or became entirely outmoded by a fundamental mixing of Catholics and Protestants. That thereby a diaspora situation arose virtually everywhere was first made painfully known to many participants at the Mainz Katholikentag of 1948 in the brief formula "Germany—Mission Country."

As in all areas, also in the religious the reconstruction proceeded from the bottom up. There struck the great hour of the parish principle. Hence the bishops in no sense made a virtue of necessity when they sought to organize the care of souls according to the so-called natural states and energetically resisted the formation of superdiocesan central associations in the old style. Nevertheless, although these rose again from the ruins and the worn-out parish principle lost in brilliance, no renaissance of any length was allowed to the Catholic associations. The great period of the denominational mass organizations with their members amounting to the hundreds of thousands was apparently over. To the change of climate of a dread of every organizational connection there contributed not a little in the early postwar period the rigorism with which especially the American occupation power subjected the last member of the Nazi Party to the process of de-Nazification. But the definitive change was first introduced with the arrival of television in the 1950s, whereby a competitor entered the scene which damaged every form of sociability outside the home.

The war of annihilation of National Socialism against Christianity had simply forced churchmen and politicians of both denominations without question into one defensive front. From the start this removed all reservations which might have made it difficult for the Catholic bishops, after the founding of the Christian Social Union (CSU) in Bavaria and the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) in the rest of Germany, to agree to an integrated party of a basic Christian direction. Hence not without skepticism they saw how staunch adherents of the Center called it again into being on a purely denominational basis, as in North Rhine-Westphalia, and thereby split the Catholic electorate. The outcome was that the notion of union became fully productive in some regions only with a certain delay. The electoral pastoral letters of the postwar period became more blurred after the resumption of this tradition in the 1960s; they especially stressed the duty of voting and the necessity of voting for candidates of proved Christian outlook. Only in a very few individual cases was there an ecclesiastical representative. The postconciliar inclination of the younger theology professors to be active for so-called election initiatives was countered by the German episcopal conference in the fall of 1973 with the prohibition "for a priest to take a stand publicly within a party, for a party, and for the election of a party."[44]

---

[43] Cf. C. J. Barry, American Nuncio, Cardinal Aloisius Muench (Collegeville 1969).

During the preliminaries for a constitution of the Federal Republic, which was established in 1949 in the territory of the three Western occupation zones,[45] the episcopate exerted itself energetically for an anchoring of the rights of parents in the Bonn basic law, but the proponents could not carry the day in the parliamentary council. Also heavily fought was the continued validity of the concordat of 1933. What on this point was established in a more general way in ARTICLE 123 of the Federal Constitution was differently interpreted according to the viewpoint of each party. For obligatory clarification the second Adenauer cabinet appealed to the Federal Supreme Court at Karlsruhe, complaining in 1955 against the state of Lower Saxony because of its nonobservance of the school regulations of the concordat. The verdict of 26 March 1957 agreed on the one hand to the continued validity of the treaty, but denied to the Federation the power to enforce provisions of the treaty where these touched the cultural supremacy of the states.[46] Unsatisfactory as the Karlsruhe verdict, seen as a whole, turned out to be for the ecclesiastical partner to the treaty, nevertheless it became the impetus for a bilateral agreement between the state of Lower Saxony and the Holy See, the concordat of 26 February 1965. The concordat concluded with Rhineland-Westphalia on 15 May 1973 took care of regulating the school question.

According to the norms established by the Second Vatican Council, the German Episcopal Conference, actually in existence for decades, gave itself its proper statute in 1967 and a legal structure in the union of the dioceses of Germany. At the end of 1965 its leadership had passed from Cardinal Frings, who remained archbishop of Cologne until 1969, to the Munich Cardinal Julius Döpfner (1913–76, bishop of Würzburg in 1948, bishop of Berlin in 1957, cardinal in 1958, and archbishop of Munich in 1961). Whether the auxiliary bishops, called by the council to participate in the conference and in some places increased rapidly, would be conducive to the function of the bishops' assemblies remains to be seen. In addition to the complete conference there also existed on the regional level the Bavarian and the West German Episcopal Conference and the East German conference of ordinaries, but participation by these last in the plenary meetings at Fulda has been forbidden since the erecting of the Berlin Wall in 1961 through the policy of demarcation.

---

[44] HK 27(1973), 549.

[45] For the time period after the founding of the Federal Republic and on the correction of F. Spott's presentation, cf. K. Forster, "Deutscher Katholizismus in der Adenauer-Ära," Konrad Adenauer und seine Zeit II (Stuttgart 1976), 488–20.

[46] Cf. F. Giese, F. A. v. d. Heydte, Der Konkordatsprozess (Munich 1957–59).

In the tracks of the Eastern policy pursued by the SPD-FDP government coalition since 1969 and yielding to the stubborn pressure of Poland's episcopate and government, the Holy See at the end of June 1972 for its part recognized the Oder-Neisse Line as Poland's frontier and in the territories annexed to Poland created a new diocesan arrangement. The German Democratic Republic strove for an analogous concession from the Vatican in order to maintain through the merger of West German enclaves and its own jurisdictional areas a diocesan division whose circumscription would coincide with the state frontiers.

Austria

In Austria, where the proclamation of the republic in 1918 deprived the Catholic Church of its imperial protector, tension-filled cultural-political times dawned after the First World War. If in Germany social democracy suspiciously rejected the Church, so too the ideologically incomparably virulent Austrian Marxism fought it with an aggressive hostility.[47] In Austria, 90 percent Catholic, the oppositions were polarized as regards party politics into the two great blocks of the Christian Socialists and the Socialists.

The latter went far beyond the atheistic or nonreligious basic attitude of the Socialist International in the sense that they imprinted on the ideological ingredients of the party program the stamp of exclusiveness. Socialism was called a counterreligion, and whoever wanted to profess it had to break with the Church. Only against this background can the at times fanatical agitation be understood with which the freethinking electors and members of the Socialist party, standing on the left, sought to separate from the Church. Occurring in two waves, the departures from the Church between 1918 and 1928 amounted in a total population of 6.1 million Catholics to 135,000, an alarming process for the Church. The fact that the leadership of the Christian Socialists and of the federal government rested for years in the hands of a priest produced an additional ingredient of tension in domestic politics. Monsignor Ignaz Seipel (1876–1932), chairman of the Christian Social party from 1921 to 1930, acquired as federal chancellor from 1922 to 1924 and from 1926 to 1929 influence and esteem beyond Austria.[48] The caliber of a statesman was attested to him even by his political opponents, but he also had to struggle with the vocation problem of the priest-politician. He was able to feel its specific vulnerability when he was denounced as a "prelate without leniency" because of his use of the police after the burning of the Palace of Justice at Vienna in 1927. In any event, from the episcopate's viewpoint the disadvantages of a commitment of clerics to party politics so clearly prevailed that the Austrian episcopal conference at the end of 1933, hence a year after Seipel's death and the elimination of parliament by Dollfuss, called upon all priests to give up the mandates exercised by them.

---

[47] Cf. P. M. Zulehner, Kirche und Austromarxismus (Vienna 1967).

In so far as the archbishop of Vienna resided in the capital of Austria, he was affected much more strongly by governmental events as chairman of the episcopate than was Cardinal Bertram at Breslau. In 1918, during the period of transition from monarchy to republic, Gustav Piffl (1864–1932, archbishop in 1913, cardinal in 1914) maintained a soberly shrewd attitude. His successor, Theodor Innitzer (1875–1955, archbishop in 1932, cardinal in 1933), was a man of charity, who, for example, stood up for the Jews in the period of persecution.[49]

The bishops viewed, not without reservation, the experiment of a Christian corporate state, introduced by the Christian Socialist Federal Chancellor Dollfuss (1932–34) and continued by Schuschnigg (1934–38), but they did not intend, for their part, to create difficulties for the Catholics of the government, hard pressed by Hitler and his Austrian followers. For this reason it was also not unproblematic to withdraw from the government's course, because the planners of the corporate state appealed to a papal encyclical. Now, of course, the derivation of this project from Quadragesimo anno was controvertible, but this did not hinder critics from charging the Church with coresponsibility for the Austrian effort to implement it. In 1930 negotiations for a concordat were conducted with the Curia, in order especially to do away with the confusion over marriage which socialist state officials had brought up when they sought to overcome the strictness of the state-Church marriage legislation of the monarchy by dubious acts of self-help. Only the government of Dollfuss brought the treaty[50] to a conclusion on 5 June 1933, not without the expectation of thereby substantially consolidating its position in domestic and foreign policy.[51]

---

[48] Cf. K. v. Klemperer, Ignaz Seipel, Staatsmann einer Krisenzeit (Graz, Vienna, and Cologne 1976).

[49] Cf. V. Reimann, Innitzer, Kardinal zwischen Hitler und Rom (Vienna 1967).

In the days of the Anschluss euphoria in March 1938, Cardinal Innitzer temporarily succumbed to the deceptive maneuvers of the Nazi agents, but as early as October he was the butt of violent demonstrations of displeasure on the part of the Nazis.[52] Meanwhile, the brutally instituted oppression of the Church had done away with all illusions. In order to create a free field of operations the Austrian concordat was declared not binding, while the validity of the concordat with Germany was restricted to the old Reich. This permitted the state and party officials more drastically to curtail the Church's sphere of influence in Austria within five months than they had been able to do in Germany in five years. By means of unilateral decrees, associations were dissolved, Catholic schools and theological faculties—Innsbruck, Salzburg, Graz—were closed, religious property was confiscated, religious instruction in accord with the school plan was abolished.

In a new wave of departures from the Church there was some displeasure in 1938–39 over the attitude of the bishops in the atmosphere of the Dollfuss era. While the state subsidies for the payment of the clergy had been paid up to then out of the religious fund established by Joseph II from church property, and deficits had been met through annual appropriations of parliament, the new rulers struck out the state payments and replaced them by a system of church contributions. Devised from clear motives for the economic weakening of the Church, the new rule had a thoroughly reverse effect, since the donation from the people was regarded not as a burdensome obligation but as a profession of the faith and of the Church.

In contrast to Germany, which was not "freed," as was Austria, but was "conquered," an Austrian political government could be set up at Vienna in April 1945 before the end of the war, although for a decade it had to share its authority and competence with the four occupation powers. During the years of the rule of force under the Nazis, the destruction of external points of support led to a deepened consciousness of the current pastoral tasks and stirred impulses which displayed themselves productively in the postwar age.

---

[50] For the content cf. Schmidlin, PG IV, 126–28.

[51] Cf. E. Weinzierl, Die österreichischen Konkordate von 1855 und 1933 (Munich 1960).

[52] Cf. J. Fried, Nationalsozialismus und Katholische Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1947); E. Weinzierl, "Österreichs Katholiken und der Nationalsozialismus," Wort und Wahrheit 18(1963), 417–39 and 493–526, 20(1965), 774–804.

After 1945 the Austrian People's Party, as successor of the Christian Social Party, and the Socialist Party of Austria worked together for more than two decades in coalition cabinets, both overcoming the hostile attitude displayed during the first republic.

Between the government parties the legal obligatory force of the concordat of 1933 was long disputed. Finally a compromise was reached in regard to Rome to agree in principle to the continuing validity but at the same time to attach to it the wish for a new treaty. However, Pius XII would have nothing to do with a sacrifice of the content of the concordat. Only under his successor were discussions resumed which led to a series of individual agreements.

These especially put the diocesan organization on a definitive basis by eliminating the provisional arrangements which had prevailed after 1919 as transitional solutions. Thus the diocese of Eisenstadt was erected on 23 June 1960 in Burgenland, annexed to Austria after the First World War, and the dioceses of Innsbruck on 7 July 1964 and Feldkirch on 7 October 1968 out of North Tyrol and Vorarlberg parts of the see of Brixen. The regulation of problems of property law in the treaty of 23 June 1960 also contributed to the relaxation of tension in state-Church relations. In return for an annual adjusting payment, thereafter the religious fund was transferred, up to 90 percent, to the possession of the state. As early as 1945 the bishops had spoken out for the maintenance of the system of church contributions. Likewise in the treaty of 9 July 1962 a satisfactory compromise was worked out for the financing of Catholic private schools.

The ground had first to be prepared for an understanding of the coalition partners over partly highly controversial material in a gradual demolition of cultural-political oppositions. Contributing not unsubstantially to this was the fact that the last champions of anticlerical Austrian Marxism of the period between the wars had moved increasingly into the background in the course of the generation change since the mid-1950s.

Switzerland

Four linguistic communities, still partly separated from one another by transverse denominational boundaries, make Switzerland not only in territorial politics a common system of complex diversity. With five bishoprics directly subject to the Holy See, which exist side by side without any connection and without constituting an ecclesiastical province, it constitutes also a special case in church organization. From this again the Swiss Episcopal Conference developed an enclosing function for supradiocesan unity, as belongs to the episcopal communities of no other countries to the same degree.

Initial steps for a resumption of relations with the Holy See, broken off in the nineteenth century, developed during the First World War when a papal agent made a permanent stay in Switzerland with the assent of the Federal Council in order to promote the humanitarian assistance work of Benedict XV. It was then only a step to the accrediting of a nuncio in Berne in 1920. Because it was quite certain that there would be rejection from some Protestant groups, no Swiss diplomat was sent to the Vatican.

Although in their concrete coexistence the traditional denominational contrasts gradually lost their sharpness, there was not for decades a thought of eliminating from the Swiss constitution the anti-Catholic article forbidding monasteries and Jesuits. The actually liberal administration of the disputed stipulation was able to lessen its weight in practice, but it was ultimately neither in conformity with the constitution nor appropriate to remove the thorn of the legal inequality. A turn was first produced by the revision of the constitution on the basis of the popular vote of 20 May 1973. Of course, on reflection it is correct that only 55 percent of those voting were in favor of the removal, and no less than 44 percent for the retaining, of the undemocratic burden. To this extent the event was instructive for the severity with which a part of the Protestant Swiss themselves clung to deeply rooted denominational prejudices against the advice of their political and ecclesiastical leadership.

Politically, the greatest number of Swiss Catholics feel themselves bound to the Christian Democratic People's party, which was founded in 1912 as the Swiss Conservative People's party. In the parliamentary elections of 1975 it obtained 21 percent of the votes cast, because of which, beside the Social Democrats with ca. 25 percent and the Liberals with more than 22 percent, it ranks as an almost equally strong political force.[53]

The Situation in the German-Speaking Area after the Second Vatican Council

After the close of the Second Vatican Council the Catholic Church in the German-speaking area was confronted to a considerable degree with equally constituted developments and problems. Since the programmatic conciliar decrees coincided with a worldwide "culture revolution," their realization, beginning after 1965, was only partially identical with the intentions of the council fathers. As a consequence one must distinguish between what is expressed in the conciliar decrees and what came from them under the diverting influence of catalysts outside the Church. In the wake of partly radical movements of emancipation, which blindly identified the change with progress and despised objective justifications, the content of the decrees issued became secondary and had to yield to the appeal to an imaginary "spirit of the council." Wherever it was called up, those inspired by it understood it mostly as sanction for any sort of change. In place of a quiet, organic, and well planned translation of the conciliar ideas into the reality of the Church stepped the capricious impetus of the revolutionary spirit of the age; in place of a reliable organization, arbitrary experiment. More than other areas of church life, the liturgy was affected by this. That the annoying high-handedness of priests remained uncorrected, unauthorized special developments were at first accepted and then even made into norms, was no way to strengthen the irresolute leadership authority. The territorial episcopates displayed more continuity and decisiveness in the defense of basic ethical values, as, for example, in confrontations concerning the freedom from punishment of abortion, in connection with which their calls for protest demonstrations in the Federal Republic and the impetus to a collecting of signatures in Austria produced a noteworthy echo.

---

[53] On the present situation cf. R. Weibel-Spirig, "Katholizismus in der Schweiz," HK 30(1976), 211–17.

On the other hand, through the freeing of theological investigation from worn-out and discredited control mechanisms a situation was created which exposed the average believer to unaccustomed burdens. That a powerfully pursued questioning did not spare even the essential ingredient of the Catholic faith but raised it pluralistically to the same level as peripheral concerns made the question of what is characteristically Catholic ever more unanswerable. In view of the confusing talk of the theologians and the extraordinary reserve of the magisterium, insecurity and confusion spread among the faithful. So long as the lower point of intervention remained concealed from the simple believer, doubts oppressed him as to whether he should interpret the reserve of those responsible as justifiable tolerance or opportunistic permissiveness. To await calmly the resolution of theological differences of opinion became problematic for the holders of the teaching office not least because the mass media, interested in controversies within the Church because of their sensational value and essential imponderableness, as self-appointed advocates taking the part of the "weaker" as determined by them, carried into the last village what should have matured only in the private discussions of experts.

After the superabundantly distributed advance laurels for the post-conciliar epoch, the disillusionment over the actual course of the development was inevitable. However, it explained only to a small degree why the union between the mass of the faithful and the institutional Church was so strikingly loosened. Even when the turning away did not go to a formal break, although the departures from the Church grew to an alarming degree, where faith activity is statistically capable of being determined, incontrovertible data indicate loss of authority and disappearance of trust. In the falling curve of regular Mass attendance and reception of the sacraments, especially in baptisms and weddings, can be read how the most deeply non-Catholic concept of the dispensability of the Church's ministry of salvation draws ever wider circles. An impetus to such ideas of relativeness was first given by the ecumenically conceived evaluation of the other Christian denominations, still more of course the crude propagating of a churchless "anonymous Christianity," by which the meaning of being a Catholic becomes entirely questionable to the average believer.

Even the liturgical reform, introduced with high expectations, made the churches not fuller but more empty. The universally accepted prelude, the permitting of the vernacular, was followed by a period of uncontrolled experimentation, which stood under the auspices of a subjectivism completely foreign to the Catholic notion of worship. The new Mass formularies, meanwhile definitively prescribed, have tried to check this, it is true, but in no sense to stop it. Thus in the place of a form of Mass of monolithic compactness there appeared a variable schema, whose subjectively filled vacuum continues to keep even the faithful who love the Church away from Sunday Mass. There was no lack of voices to oppose to the allegedly outdated concept of the Church of the people the new ecclesiological pattern of a "congregational church," which wanted to be, no longer for all, but only for the "decided." From such a viewpoint the distancing movement no longer appears as a weakening of the Church's wholeness but as a process of selection, which it aims to foster.

The priest's idea of his office and self-awareness were hardest hit by the general crisis of the Church. This was expressed externally in an abrupt numerical decline, so that ever fewer parochial offices could be filled by a priest, an emergency which will nevertheless be worked out completely only in the future. This overturning of the age pyramid was caused by a drop in the number of recruits and by the turning of many active priests to other professions.

Offshoots of antiauthoritarian and antiinstitutional currents produced in some dioceses loose unions of priests of the middle and younger generations, which understood themselves as a critical pendant to the bishop's authority. Although there was no lack of journalistic support and echo to the various priests' solidarity groups during the foundation period, 1969–70, these disappeared again a little later from public discussion. That they were formed at all was an indication of the limiting of the episcopal freedom of decision.

The Church's official authority can withstand attacks from within and without as long as it is based on firm principles and does not wreck itself by inner contradiction. Faith in the conformity of principle of episcopal activity has now been shattered precisely in those groups of the people who hitherto have stood, not against, but for the maintenance of the bishop's authority. Their criticism was let loose by the differing use of the executive power through the prohibition of celebrating Mass in the Tridentine Rite. This stands in striking contrast to the indulgence with which the bishops for years overlooked liturgical aberrations and arbitrariness. The passive leaving alone in the one and the resolute postponement in the other case have inevitably aroused suspicion that not primarily objective requirements but the measure of anticipated readiness to obey could determine the decisions of the pastoral office. If the use of the episcopal authority should only too often be guided by pragmatic considerations, which lie in the attempt to deal liberally with the progressives and authoritatively with the conservatives, or, to say it pointedly, to meet the one as powerless Church of love, the other as loveless Church of power, then the outcome could only be a growing alienation.

After some preliminary deliberations and fumbling efforts to bring the impulses of the council into a practicable program on the parish level in diocesan synods at Hildesheim and Vienna, the trend toward synods on the national level established itself at the end of the 1960s. As the first, there was constituted in Würzburg at the beginning of January 1971 the Common Synod of the Dioceses of the German Federal Republic. This was followed, though with a partly differently constituted order of procedure, by the Austrian Synodal Process and the Swiss Synod '72. By way of the start to "Germanize" the council, the Würzburg meeting, with its catalogue of themes at first embracing more than fifty points, went considerably beyond the framework of the council. However, then in fact only eighteen proposals were enacted, many with impressive majorities, others, like the draft "Church and Workers," only after sharp controversy. To the Catholics of central Germany the road to Würzburg was closed by the restrictive policy of the German Democratic Republic. As in all areas of Communist domination, the Church of the German Democratic Republic is under strict state supervision and enjoys only that freedom of movement which is officially allowed it, in the German Democratic Republic since 1957 by the Office for Church Questions. Left to themselves the Central German Catholics established their own church assembly, the "Pastoral Synod of the Jurisdictions in the German Democratic Republic," which held its meetings in the Dresden court church.

Ten years after the Second Vatican Council the Church as a whole has obviously not crossed the postconciliar valley of reform in all its breadth. In what form and with what authority it will come out of this process of change only the future can show. Thus in the German-speaking area also the forerunners of a new cohesion and stability, without which a regaining of lost terrain is unthinkable, are not yet in sight.

CHAPTER 19

*The Church in the Benelux Countries

Belgium

After the war of 1914–18, in which the patriotic bearing of Cardinal Mercier increased its reputation, the Church of Belgium found itself facing a new reality. The introduction of the general right to vote ended the dominance of the Catholic Party that had been in power since 1884. In order to maintain the religious influence on the still Christian parts of the population and to restore it in the areas where it had been lost, the bishops, under the sure leadership of Cardinal Van Roey (1925–61), exerted themselves to increase those institutions and organizations whose legal status the law of 1921 on nonprofit associations had finally regulated. Further, the bishops worked for the political unity of the Catholics, which seemed to be very necessary in order to defend these organizations and to promote a specific notion of society.

The Catholic educational system expanded further and was progressively organized until the founding in 1957 of the National Secretariat for Catholic Education. Thanks to the reconciliation of the parties, the law of 1914 on subsidies was applied after the war to elementary schools. From 1921 to 1969 the proportion of pupils who attended Catholic schools grew from ca. 46 to 51 percent. The long neglected professional training now became the preferred object of the clergy. The financial problems of the Catholic school system, already long present, led from 1950 to 1958 to a new school conflict. This was settled by a "school treaty," which the three great parties signed and the parliament ratified in 1959. In the same manner the state little by little assumed almost all the costs of university education. Except for the university area, religious instruction was imparted to a growing degree in almost all educational systems publicly operated.

---

* Belgium and Luxemburg: Andre Tihon; The Netherlands: Johannes Bots, S.J.

The social organizations took root powerfully. The Christian unions which in 1925 included only one-fourth of the membership of socialist unions, outstripped these in the 1950s and displayed a growing pugnacity. The professional groups were rich and numerous and variously organized. The assurances of reciprocity and the institutions of the health system and of the social sphere constituted a dense and ever more active network.

Among the apostolic works, Catholic Action experienced an upsurge especially among the youth. The Action catholique de la jeunesse belge was in principle intended for all groups, but the Jeunesse ouvrière chrétienne (JOC), established by Abbé Cardijn right after the war, finally brought it about that it was accepted as a specialized movement of Catholic Action. Its dynamism had as a consequence the transformation of the general Catholic Action into specialized movements, which at a given moment were aimed at students, middle class, and farmers. From 1926 on the influence of the JOC moved beyond Belgium and finally reached the other continents. Alongside the traditional youth groups a Catholic branch of the Boy Scouts was also formed.

In order to take account of and accomodate the growth of the population from 7,423,784 inhabitants in 1910 to 9,650,944 by 1970—30 percent—the rhythm of which of course slowed down, the bishops created new parishes, especially in the developed areas of high population density and in the thickly inhabited regions. This permitted the retaining of the average number of 2,126 to 2,374 inhabitants per parish from 1919 to 1972, which had increased between 1850 and 1910 from 1,444 to 2,126. The number of dioceses grew, through the founding of the sees of Antwerp in 1961 and Hasselt in 1967, from six to eight.

This extraordinary growth of the ecclesiastical administrative organization was compensated by the fact that the diocesan clergy grew relatively faster up to 1960 than the population. The number of priests rose between 1910 and 1960 from 7,857 to 10,386, but then dropped to 9,113 by 1972. Among the female religious the growth was much less: in 1910 there were 47,975, in 1947 their number reached a climax with 49,624, among whom the female religious of Belgian origin increased from 32,393 to 42,275. After a period of slow decline to 46,675 until 1960, a clear falling off can be seen: in 1972 there were only 35,331 nuns. The institutes of men experienced a greater growth, from 5,747 in 1910 to 10,056 in 1947. They stayed at this level until 1960—10,414—but then until 1972 experienced a very strong decline to 6,044.

In an effort to assure the Catholics a maximum in organizational strength, the bishops stood for the retention of a strong and united Catholic party. For the sake of this goal, of course, the tensions which threatened to split the Catholics in two had to be relaxed: on the one hand, the conflict between the various social classes, on the other hand that between the Flemish and the Walloon factions. In order to limit the first problem, in 1921 the Catholic party was transformed into a Union catholique belge. This included the former conservative and Walloon Féderation de Cercles and the Ligue nationale des travailleurs chrétiens, which in 1919 took the place of the Ligue démocratique, then the Boerenbond, which represented the agricultural interest, and finally the Féderation des classes moyennes, founded in 1919. In order to preserve unity, the episcopate in 1935, but especially from 1937 on, condemned "Rexism," a movement with a Fascist tendency founded by L. Degrelle. Vis-à-vis the Flemish movements, the bishops sought to moderate their exertions and to fight the nationalist parties. The effort was made to bring the Catholic forces together again with the aid of the Congress of Mechelen in 1936 and in 1937 to reform the party by creating a Catholic bloc, which embraced a Flemish and a Walloon wing.

After the Second World War, in which the episcopate played a very much more cautious role than in 1914–18, the attempt to overcome the split between Catholics and anticlericals by means of a Union démocratique belge soon collapsed. During the following decades the Parti social chrétien, which tended a little farther to the left than the former Catholic party and was easily de-confessionalized, gathered, especially in Flanders, the greatest part of the faithful around it. This party maintained its role as support for the Catholic organizations and especially for the Catholic instructional system. But as soon as the school treaty had been concluded, the linguistic tensions split the Catholics more and more and finally led to the separation of Louvain from the francophone university in 1966–68. Thereafter the party experienced a considerable decline in favor of the regional parties.

Attendance at Sunday Mass remained during the entire period on a low level: in 1950 ca. 50 percent of the population to whom the command applied were present at Sunday Mass. In 1964 the proportion had dropped to 45 percent, and from then on it went down quickly: in 1972 it was only 34 percent. A difference between particular regions is clearly discernible: Flanders with 48 percent, the Walloon areas with 31 percent—in regard to which, of course, there are enormous differences between the industrial areas and the Ardennes—and Brussels with 23 percent in 1967. In contrast to this, people maintained the essential practices, such as baptism, church weddings and ecclesiastical burial. In 1972 there were still 90 percent of baptisms, 82 percent of weddings, and 84 percent of church burials. Even in regions like Seraing and perhaps also Charleroi, which ca. 1900 were strongly influenced by anticlericalism, these religious practices again increased in the period 1914–20. In the period between the two world wars, Antoinism, a religious movement of adherents of a miracle-healing sect, whose founder died in 1906, acquired a certain expansion in specific regions with a Walloon population. Some even turned to Protestantism.

But these internal difficulties could not impair very powerful missionary efforts. These included the activity of Father Lebbe, the initiatives of Father Charles for teaching the faith, and the founding of societies for promoting new forms of missionary presence, for which, for example, the AUCAM (1925) and the AFI (1937) were of special significance. The number of missionaries, monks and nuns, rose from 4,759 in 1940 to 10,070 in 1960. In the same way concern was manifested for the Universal Church by the founding of the college for Latin America in 1954. In a country in which the non-Catholic minorities have little importance, the ecumenical movement developed on a higher level. This is attested by the Malines Conversations with the Anglicans from 1921 to 1925 and the foundation in 1926 of the Priory of Amay by Dom Lambert Beauduin, which is dedicated to the work for reunion and in 1939 was transferred to Chevetogne.

In internal life several movements among a minority led to a deepening of faith. These were, as early as the period between the two World Wars, but especially after 1945, the liturgical movement and the biblical renewal movement, stimulated by the group of the Louvain teacher, L. Cerfaux, also the "Residential District Groups," and finally apostolic works like the Legion of Mary. Furthermore, a foreign office for the pastoral care of immigrant workers was organized.

Side by side with the pastoral activity, the Catholic University of Louvain constituted an important center of Christian self-realization: some of its professors played an important role at the Second Vatican Council. Soon the new currents stirred in the conciliar atmosphere caused confusion which, however, operated less spectacularly and less toward renewal than in the Netherlands.

Luxemburg

The Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, occupied by Germany from 1914 to 1918, had to turn to Belgium after the war. After the abdication of Marie Adélaïde, whom Grand Duchess Charlotte succeeded, and after the introduction of the universal right to vote in 1919, the Catholic party founded in 1914 came to power; it was able to keep in first place up to the present. In this party, the clergy played a powerful role. With the appointment of Monsignor Nommesch to the episcopal see in 1920, this political change made possible the reintroduction of religious instruction in the state elementary schools.

In contrast to the other Benelux countries, the Church has almost no schools of its own. On the other hand, the Church dominates the most important daily paper in the country, and pastoral care can rely firmly on the traditions of a region which up to ca. 1950 preserved a rural mentality, although heavy industry had settled in the country even before 1914. Religious practice remained in a good state: in 1957 at Clerfaux 99 percent made their Easter Communion; of course, this number declined in Luxemburg to 55 percent or in an industrial deanery such as Esch-sur-Alzette to 51 percent.

The Netherlands

PERIOD OF FLOWERING (1919–60)

The development of the Catholic Church in the Netherlands after the First World War ran in broad outline parallel to that in other European countries: thus, as elsewhere, the Dutch Catholics—ca. 30 percent in 1850, then increasing to ca. 40 percent by 1950—came to the conviction that their faith would be jeopardized in living together with those thinking otherwise. The ideology whereby the others preserved their cultural, social, and political interests was to such a degree anti-Christian among liberals and socialists and anti-Catholic among Protestants that the Catholics saw themselves forced to subordinate a series of life spheres, even those not of a strictly religious nature, to their own management.[1] As regards the construction of entirely defined denominational associations for a community life and for cooperation, the Dutch Catholics went much farther than the Catholics in any other country. In this regard they also went much farther than the other ideologically marked groupings in their own country, namely the Protestants (ca. 40 percent) the socialists, and the liberals, the so-called "pillars," who likewise had their own "pillar" organizations. There thus arose the absolutely singular situation that the Dutch Catholics, although they lived together in a modern pluralist society with Protestants, humanists, socialists, and so forth, nevertheless associated almost exclusively with other Catholics.[2] In turn there were organized on a Catholic basis: the charitable institutions, the care of the sick and of the emotionally disturbed, the press—the supraregional dailies De Tijd and De Maasbode, both founded ca. 1850—the educational system—from kindergartens to the Roman Catholic University of Nijmegen, founded in 1923, and the Catholic School of Economics in Tilburg, founded in 1927—politics—Roman Catholic political party of 1898, since 1946 Catholic Popular Party (KVP)—social life in corporate organizations for the religious and moral interests of employees and economic life through unions, which more and more served economic interests—1903, later under the name Dutch Catholic Union Alliance (NKV). And finally the entire field of entertainment—sports associations, and so forth. In 1926 a special Catholic broadcasting system, KRO, was founded.

---

[1] J. Bots, "Aggiornamento," Grote Spectrum Encyclopedie (1975), 210–12.

This self-sufficient system, whereby the Catholics took secular activities into their own hands, developed further to about 1960. In this regard the Second World War was not much more than an interlude. The Catholics of the Netherlands remained at this time in a patient and unprovoking, consistently unselfish manner imperturbable under the courageous leadership of the archbishop of Utrecht, Monsignor Johannes de Jong, a cardinal in 1946. Many, even non-Catholics, saw in him a sort of personification of the spiritual resistance against National Socialism. In regard to the German occupation the bishops had recourse to the scorched-earth policy: as soon as the Germans extended their hand for one of the Catholic organizations, they gave the officers and members instructions to withdraw from all offices and to renounce their membership.[3] The fact that the bishops were ready to destroy the monuments of the emancipation with their own hand is a proof of the deepest religious justification of the Catholic commitment in these secular fields. At the moment when the Catholic faith saw no more possibility of continuing to work in them, in their opinion these institutions had no more meaning. After the war the bishops passed a resolution to reestablish the earlier social and cultural organizations on a Catholic basis. Decisive for this was the pastoral argument: together with the great majority of Catholics they believed it was no longer possible to be responsible for withholding from the faithful the molding strength of their institutions, in any event not at this time in the moral disorder at the end of the war.

Around 1953 the Netherlands had overcome the consequences of the war and the loss of the colonies. In 1953 the Dutch Catholics celebrated in complete unity the centenary of the restoration of the hierarchy. Considered from without, it seemed that only a little changed in the situation of the Church in the Netherlands to 1960. External activity was astounding in all areas. The organization of the ecclesiastical province was further improved. Bishoprics were erected at Rotterdam and Groningen in 1955. Thereby the number of dioceses increased from five to seven. Catholic secondary schools were spread over the country: eight out of ten Catholics of higher schools attended a Catholic secondary school. In contrast to almost all other countries, Catholic parents needed to make no financial sacrifice for this, for the entire denominational school system was 100 percent supported by the state. Catholics had leading positions in all areas of Catholic life. As the largest party—ca. 30 percent—in the government they were firm partners in the coalition with socialists or with Protestants and liberals. Ninety percent of the Catholic electorate voted for the KVP, 79 percent were subscribers to a Catholic daily, 90 percent were subscribers to the KRO.[4]

---

[2] A. Lijphart, The Politics of Accommodation: Pluralism and Democracy in the Netherlands (Berkeley 1968).

[3] L. J. Rogier, In vrijheid herboren (The Hague 1953), 741.

Also in the social and socioecclesiastical respect, Dutch Catholicism had special results: the workers did not leave the Church en masse. On the contrary: together with the middle class they formed precisely the supporting force of the Dutch believing community. From the social idealism of Catholics—H. Poels, 1868–1948; A. Ariens, 1860–1928—proceeded a transforming and adjusting strength to the whole Dutch society; it induced Pope Pius XI in 1931 on the occasion of an audience for a delegation of Dutch Catholic workers at Rome to declare that "there is no country in the world in which the doctrine of Rerum novarum is so well understood and is realized in fact."[5] In this respect the Netherlands stood alone at the top.[6]

The spiritual and ecclesiastical life in the stricter sense flowered here with "tropical" vitality. While in the century between 1855 and 1952 the number of Catholics trebled, the number of priests had become six times as large: from 624 to 3,695 per decade.[7] In 1967 there were in the Netherlands ca. 13,500 priests (4,000 diocesan priests in 7 dioceses and 9,400 religious priests in 34 orders and congregations), ca. 7,000 brothers and almost 32,000 sisters in 111 orders and congregations (89 active and 22 contemplative).[8] This means that for every 100 Dutch Catholics there was one priest, brother, or sister—in France .45; Belgium, .79; Spain, .42; England, .69; Germany, East and West, .47; Switzerland, .77; Austria, .39.[9]

---

[4] J. M. G. Thurlings, De wankele zuil. Nederlandse katholieken tussen assimilatie en pluralisme (Nijmegen 1971), 127.

[5] P. H. Winkelman, "Nederland," 150 jaar katholieke arbeidersbeweging in West-Europa 1789–1939 (Hilversum 1961), 350.

[6] J. B. Sloot, "Van kerkelijk spreken naar sprekende kerk. Een sociologische analyse van de officiële verklaringen van het Nederlands episcopaat 1945–1974" (ms., Nijmegen 1974), 79.

[7] J. J. Dellepoort, De priesterroepingen in Nederland (The Hague 1955), 51.

The expansion of its evangelizing activity was always the most eloquent sign of the vitality of Dutch Catholicism. In this regard the Netherlands was favored by the consequences of the anti-clerical developments in Germany and France. Many missionary congregations fled to the Netherlands. While the Dutch Catholics did not even constitute 2 percent of the total of Catholics in the world, in 1939 they accounted for 11 percent of all priest missionaries. In 1954 7,000 missionaries—priests, brothers, sisters—were active in the overseas missions, that is, one missionary for 600 Dutch Catholics—1 for 1,500 Belgians, 1 for 2,600 French, 1 for 1,200 Italians and Spaniards.[10]

DISINTEGRATION (1960–70)

The 1960s were marked by a sudden increase of prosperity. The Netherlands moved into the circle of the ten richest countries in the world. The coalition cabinets of the postwar period, of Catholics with partners of the left and right, let this wealth benefit the weaker members of society with the aid of a broadly constructed system of social legislation. In 1967 expenses for social welfare amounted to 26.3 percent of the gross national product as contrasted with 22.1 percent in West Germany and 19.4 percent in Belgium.

More than other ideological groups, the Catholics profited from this increase in prosperity. Their persistent struggle for emanicipation began to bear its choicest fruits at this time. Within the circle of Catholics the academically educated especially benefited from the good times. And precisely this group of people began to become very numerous in the 1960s.[11] Young university-trained Catholics from the middle class rose in great numbers with their functions of leadership into the so-called upper middle-class. As often happens with the nouveaux riches, their rise went parallel with an assimilation to the hierarchy of values of this upper middle-class on the one hand and a loss of the feeling of union with the class and traditions in which they had grown up on the other hand. This social breakthrough acquired in them an ideological stamp and a corresponding justification in the so-called "breakthrough idea," which had already gained ground since the war, especially in the effort "to break out" of the special closed Catholic organizations to collaboration with others in neutral, supradenominational organizations. This breakthrough idea was at first restricted to a pretty small circle, but in the course of the postwar years exercised a growing power of attraction on the Catholics who were in process of emancipation, especially on the intellectuals, for whom this period was especially favorable in the social and economic respect. When the bishops determined that the process of alienation from the Church (between 1930 and 1947 an average of 10,000 Catholics annually left the Church) always won influence on those Catholics who did not belong to the "pillar" organizations, which acted as replacement for the traditional integrating factors that were becoming looser—village, neighborhood, family—in a pastoral letter of 1 May 1954 they came out against the breakthrough idea. In it they pleaded for "unity in an association of their own and from there for cooperation with others while reserving their independence" (no. 15). True, the Dutch Catholics received this pastoral letter[12]—with threats of ecclesiastical penalties for listening to the socialist radio, VARA, and for reading socialist writings—in general without special comment; resistance was confined to a small group of intellectuals. In the 1960s these last obtained support from a large group of young academicians, priests, and laity, who together formed the advance guard of the Dutch movement of renewal.

---

[8] Katholiek sociaal kerkelijk instituut, Broeders- en zusters-religieuzen in Nederland per 1.1.1967 (The Hague 1967), 19.

[9] W. Kusters, "Situatieschets van het Nederlands katholicisme 1968. Crisis en riskerend vertrouwen," Riskante kerk, vijf jaar Pastoraal Instituut van de Nederlandse Kerkprovincie (The Hague 1968), 148.

[10] F. van Heek, Het geboorteniveau der Nederlandse Rooms-Katholieken (Leiden 1954), 170.

[11] J. M. G. Thurlings, op. cit., 31.

Sociological investigations confirm that in the hierarchy of values of these nouveaux riches the free development of the personality and the "being able to be oneself" stood in high esteem. Authenticity, freedom, majority, pluralism, openness, rationality were the ideals favored by them. These obviously positive values were burdened with ideology by them so that they were appropriated with a certain exclusiveness, which the nouveaux rich cultivated. There was an allergic reaction to complementary values, such as the meaning of sacrifice and renunciation, rights of the community and the validity of authority, the transcendence of God, which were expressed, among other ways, in the creeds which were beyond reason, in mystic symbols and rites.[13]

Of course, this hierarchy of values, accepted in all welfare states by the so-called social center and with the help of instruction, of the mass media, and of the entertainment industry, which were dominated by the new intellectual elite, was forced on the other classes.[14] What was special, however, in the Dutch situation was that this new class knew how to force its power to a greater degree than elsewhere also on the average people of the Church. It could impose its image of people on all "ordinary" believers and on ecclesiastical developments. In its exercise of power the new elite obtained support from the same factors which originally constituted the power of the Dutch communities of believers: the strong and varied organizations and the high density of communication, now entirely especially strengthened by television with its power of suggestion and its leveling presentation.[15] As on the occasion of a dam bursting, through these channels a constant stream of criticism and doubts poured over the Dutch Catholics, who were much less prepared for it than the faithful elsewhere. This intensive, never diminished publicity set a process of fermentation in motion which made clear the magnitude and breadth of the Dutch movement of renewal. Mass expressions of it were, among others, the "Teilhard mode," the "Robinson mania" (40,000 copies of Honest to God were bought in four months), the unrest over the New Catechism (a half-million copies), the 15,000 dialogue groups after the council, the sudden, almost complete end of auricular confession, and the massive drop in the number of priests, brothers, and sisters. On the one hand there began in 1965 a massive departure of priests and religious: 1,732 priests (549 diocesan and 1,183 religious between 1965 and 1975, almost three times as many as the world average)[16] and between 1961 and 1970 4,300 lay religious (1,600 brothers and 2,700 sisters with perpetual vows).[17] On the other hand, the number of priestly ordinations dropped from 318 in 1960 (91 diocesan and 227 religious priests) to 20 in 1976 (4 diocesan and 16 religious priests). In neighboring countries, such as Germany and Belgium, the number of ordinations dropped to 50 and 40 percent respectively, in the Netherlands to less than 10 percent. And the faithful also remained apart from the Church in large numbers: attendance at Sunday Mass dropped from 70.75 percent in 1961 to 34 percent in 1976. The number of mixed marriages almost doubled between 1955 and 1972.[18]

---

[12] Ibid., 121.

[13] O. Schreuder, "Die deprivierte Mitte," W. Weymann-Weyhe, Die offene Kirche (Düsseldorf 1974), 234–64.

---

[14] H. Schelsky, Die Arbeit tun die anderen. Klassenkampf und Priesterherrschaft der Intellektuellen, 2d ed. (Opladen 1975).

[15] W. Kusters, op. cit., 164.

[16] L. J. Rogier, P. Brachim, Histoire du catholicisme hollandais depuis le XVIe siècle (Paris 1974), 227.

[17] Jan Roes, R. K. Nederland 1958–1973 (Nijmegen 1974), 26.

[18] Kaski over gemengde huwelijken in Nederland (March 1974).

In the transition from one phase to the other it seemed as though the Dutch Catholics had found support in Monsignor W. Bekkers, bishop of the largest Dutch diocese, Den Bosch (1960–66), and a famed television speaker. A few months after Bekkers's sudden death in May 1966 appeared The New Catechism: Proclamation of the Faith for Adults, a book with many merits but also with weaknesses of Dutch welfare Catholicism. These weaknesses were in connection with the one-sided incarnational theology, which focused on the downward-moving love of God for humans in Jesus Christ but less on the upward movement of the person to God in Jesus's sacrificial death and in the self-sacrifice of the person, in fact the latter was considered almost as a contradiction of the former.[19] Corrections from Rome in 1968 in regard to original sin, the virginal birth, the sacrificial character of the Eucharist, and so forth were not accepted by the authors. Then the bishops let these corrections be published only in a special brochure.

Most extensive were the changes in connection with the education of priests. Within a few years all fifty minor seminaries had disappeared from the scene. Between 1963 and 1969 all thirty-two philosophical and thirty theological institutions were concentrated in five larger cities. Typical of the Dutch movement of renewal is the extent and compactness in this movement of concentration. The new project contained some positive points—openness, the corresponding instruments for work, selection of professors, better payment since the complete financing on the level of the university. But opposing these were negative points—the halving of the number of students—1,000 instead of 2,000—of whom only a small number sought a celibate priesthood.[20] The episcopate had no great influence on the course of events relating to these institutions.

The Dutch Pastoral Council, which held six meetings at Noordwijkerhout from 1966 to 1970, seemed to be a sort of crowning of the work of the Dutch renewal movement. As "council" it understood itself in the sense of a "Total Council of all the Faithful of the Ecclesiastical Province." But the documents so strongly breathed the spirit of the newly established upper middle-class that the council has been qualified as a typical "middle-class enterprise," whose representatives undertook to try to create a renewed Church on "its model and likeness." The references to the Second Vatican Council must be regarded as an ideologically stamped selection of the renewal needs of middle-class

---

[19] J. Ratzinger, "Theologie und Verkündigung im holländischen Katechismus," Dogma und Verkündigung (Munich and Freiburg i. Br. 1973), 77.

[20] Katholiek Archief 30(1975), 158.

Catholics.[21] The meeting interpreted the enormous fluctuation of the last years entirely positively and irreversibly.[22] The dramatic climax was the discussions on the abolition of obligatory celibacy. Despite the urging of the Pope not to treat this point, the meeting wanted by this very point to demonstrate its coming of age and freedom. The Pope made his protest clear by ordering the pronuncio, A. Felici, to stay away from the gathering. By an overwhelming majority the Council expressed itself for the so-called decoupling and for the reintroduction of married priests in the priestly ministry.

Since then the Dutch ecclesiastical province has given a clear example of the destiny which befalls a Church when it exchanges the direction of the legitimate holders of office for the power of persons who dominate opinion. Catholic faithful, who expressed the desire for the usual Catholic liturgy within the possibilities of the renewed official missal, parents who wanted to have their children given Catholic religious instruction, were characterized as "conservative," "unworldly," "intolerant," and the like, by the group which had power over the means of communication. Nowhere was the inner laceration of the Dutch believing community more visible than in the liturgy. In 1976 there was still no prospect that in the foreseeable future an official Dutch edition of the renewed missal would appear. People feared the normative impact of such an edition.

The desire for activity in the area of liturgy—734 liturgical worker groups in 1975—and the struggle against celibacy have burdened Dutch welfare Catholicism with the odium of being especially an inner church movement. "Critical communities"—ca. one hundred in 1976—had the desire to correct the onesidedness fostered by them. But by opposing the Church just as critically as they did society, they isolated themselves from the Church and furthered the process of disintegration, as Cardinal Alfrink said.[23]

In summary it can be said that, in comparison to the other ecclesiastical provinces, the crisis in the Netherlands began earlier and that the spirit of the enlightened bourgeoisie institutionalized itself in new church structures, so that at first glance it is not to be expected that a movement more directed to the Universal Church could quickly make its influence prevail on minds. Unless, of course, Rome would let the suppressed voices of the "ordinary" Catholics have more support, as happened in the naming of Monsignor Doctor A. Simonis as bishop of Rotterdam on 30 December 1970.

---

[21] O. Schreuder, op. cit., 254.

[22] M. Schmaus, L. Scheffczyk, J. Giers, Exempel Holland. Theologische Analyse und Kritik des niederländischen Pastoralkonzils, 2d ed. (Berlin), 49.

[23] "Kardinaal Alfrink in Kruispunt KRO-radio op 13.1.1974." Analecta aartsbisdom Utrecht, Feb. 1974, 136.

The cadres of the dioceses—deaneries, administrative groups, councils, theology professors, and so forth—staged in newspapers, radio, and television a week-long campaign against this papal appointment.[24] From this it became obvious how Dutch Catholicism was dominated by a small group of powerful persons, who exercised their domination through the mass media; the majority of the people of the diocese expressed themselves for the bishop.[25]

At the naming of the bishop of Roermond, Doctor J. M. Gijsen, in February 1972 the same scene was repeated: protests in the press, on radio, and on television on the part of the cadres, agreement with this new bishop on the part of the great majority of his flock, who, however, could not assert themselves in the general communications happening.[26] Throughout the entire country there appeared a growing movement of opposition, the "Open Church." A sociological analysis[27] of this movement proves that the leaders and members belong to those categories which in our Western society exercise "a new priestly domination": the intellectuals and half-intellectuals from the "Third Sector" of the Relief State.[28] Its considerable influence is the mightiest factor for the explanation of the crisis in the postconciliar Church in many Western countries. What is special about the Dutch church province seems to be only that this stratum has a firm grip on all key positions within the Church.

---

[24] Archief der kerken, 26 (1971), nos. 6–7.

[25] T. Steltenpool, Orthodoxie verboden? (n.d.), 26.

[26] "Opinie-onderzoek in verband met de benoeming van de bisschop van Roermond, t.b.v. Redaktie 'Kenmerk' door Intomart," Noordse Bosje 15(Hilversum).

[27] O. Schreuder, op. cit., 250f.

[28] H. Schelsky, op. cit., passim.

CHAPTER 20

*Catholicism in Italy

In 1914 one could hardly speak of an Italian Church as of a homogeneous structure. The differences among the various regions were very great, and because there was no episcopal conference coordination was absent. The 279 dioceses were, also through the weight of tradition, not arranged in a rational way. Besides very large dioceses, such as Milan and Novara, there were, especially in the south, many very small dioceses. In 1885 there were 76, 381 diocesan priests in the service of 20,707 parishes, while the number of seminaries amounted to 11,569. In 1911 there were 67,147 diocesan priests; the number of religious priests in that year amounted to 6,644, that of nuns to 38,609.[1]

---

* Luigi Mezzardi

The education of the clergy was in general defective, and for this there were chiefly two reasons: the consequences of the Modernist crisis and the backwardness of the greatest part of the seminaries, to which a productive dialogue with secular culture was foreign. After the dissolution of the theological faculties at the state universities in 1872, academic degrees were earned either in the local faculties or at the Roman universities with mainly foreign teaching personnel and hence at a great distance from the problems of Italian reality. For its part the anti-Modernist repression had removed qualified professors from the seminaries and at that time deprived the students of outstanding texts, as, for example, the church history books of F. X. Funk and F. X. Kraus and the patrology of G. Rauschen.[2]

The fact that the clergy came predominantly from the country had, however, permitted the priests to keep in contact with social reality. While the students to some degree held themselves aloof, the tradition of the pastors close to the people proved to be very fruitful. For this, especially in the north, the parishes were the place where one could encounter the Christian experience: it was the place of religious instruction, of social and charitable education, and also of political orientation. In the south, on the other hand, the clergy was faced with a situation in which the emotional elements and the weight of folklore were much greater.[3]

---

[1] G. Bertolotti, Statistica ecclesiastica d'Italia (Savona 1885); also, Sommario di statistiche storiche d'Italia 1865–1965; Annuario statistico italiano; L. Cavalli, Sociologia della storia italiana (Bologna 1974); S. S. Acquaviva, L'eclissi del sacro nella civiltà industriale (Milan 1967); S. S. Acquaviva, G. Guizzardi, Religione e irreligione nell'età postindustriale (Rome 1971); for the Protestants: F. Manzotti, "I Valdesi a Guastalla e nella bassa padana," Nuova rivista storica 41 (1957), 418–55; A. Moscato, M. N. Pierini, Rivolta religiosa nelle campagne (Rome 1965); G. Spini, "Movimenti evangelici nell'Italia contemporanea," Rivista Storica Italiana 80 (1968), 463–98; F. Barra, "Millenarismo predicazione evangelica ed agitazioni contadine in Irpina dall'età giolittiana al fascismo," Ricerche di storia sociale e religiosa 3 (1974), 161–88.

[2] M. Guasco, Fermenti nei seminari del primo' 900 (Bologna 1971); idem, "L'organizzazione delle scuole e dei seminari tra Leone XIII e Pio X," in the collection Modernismo, fascismo e communismo, a cura di G. Rossini (Bologna 1972), 192–204. Characteristic is the Lanzoni case: L. Bedeschi, Lineamenti dell'antimodernismo. Il caso Lanzoni (Parma 1970).

[3] Useful: AA. VV., Chiesa e religiosità dopo l'unità, 4 vols. (Milan 1973); AA. VV., Chiesa e spiritualità dell'ottocento italiano (Padua 1970); M. Mariotti, Forme di collabora-

The religious life had a visible upsurge, and appeared especially in the sphere of charity with Don Orione, of aid for immigrants with Scalabrini and Cabrini, and of the press with Don Alberione. Eleven orders of men were founded after 1900, among them the Consolata Missionary Fathers in 1901, the Sons of Divine Providence in 1903, and the Paolini in 1914. The number of orders of women founded after 1900 amounted to 120, of which fifty-four were in the north, twenty-six in the center, and forty in the south and on the islands. Typical are the multiple foundations: Don Giuseppe Alberione (d. 1971) founded the nine communities of the Paolini family, and Don Luigi Orione (d. 1940) four communities. Within this impetus in the religious life, the flowering of the missionary system is especially interesting. In the wake of Daniele Comboni (d. 1881) and Angelo Ramazzotti (d. 1861), the founders of the Comboniani and of the Pontifical Institute for Foreign Missions (PIME), Giuseppe Allamano (d. 1926) and Guido Maria Conforti (d. 1931) not only founded the institutes of the Consolata and the Xaverians, but they contributed also to the awakening of a mission awareness among people and clergy, especially through the work of Father Paolo Manna (d. 1952).

In 1911 Italy had 35,845,000 inhabitants—in 1872 there were 27,303,000. Over 37 percent of this population was still illiterate—in 1871 illiterates had constituted 70 percent of the total. Catholics made up 95.1 percent of the population, Protestants .36 percent. At that time there were 874,523 persons—2.5 percent—who declared they belonged to no religion, while 653,404 did not answer this question. The areas with the strongest religious indifference were at Leghorn (18.4 percent) and Reggio Emilia (14.1 percent). Emilia-Romagna was the region with the highest percentage of those leaving the Church (9.63 percent). But this phenomenon of de-Christianization was not restricted to the upper social classes; it appeared also in the strata of the simple folk, as, for example, in Emilia and Tuscany. In the country social distress favored the external retention of religion. Anticlericalism[4] and religious ignozione tra vescovi e laici in Calabria negli ultimi cento anni (Padua 1969); A. Gambasin, Gerarchia e laicato in Italia nel secondo ottocento (Padua 1969); C. Bellò, Società ed evangelizzazione nell'Italia contemporanea. Linee di una storia e di una pastorale (Brescia 1974).

---

[4] On anticlericalism in the Risorgimento, see S. Jacini, "La tradizione anticlericale del Risorgimento italiano," Studium 32 (1936), 348–56, 406–16; G. Pepe, M. Themelly, L'anticlericalismo nel Risorgimento (Manduria 1966); G. Verucci, "Anticlericalismo, libero pensiero e ateismo nel movimento operaio e socialista italiano (1861–1878)," in AA. VV., Chiesa e religiosità dopo l'unità II (Milan 1973), 176–224; P. Scoppola, "Laicismo e anticlericalismo," ibid., 225–74. G. Spadolini, Per una storia dell'anticlericalismo: I repubbulicani dopo l'unità (Florence 1963); M. Sylvers, rance were very widespread. Also, the theological instruction of the laity was inadequate because of the powerful overemphasis on the Roman Question, which directed the best energies predominantly to the political and social sphere. Important figures of this period were: Bartolo Longo (d. 1926), promoter of the pilgrimage to Pompeii, the Blessed Giuseppe Moscati (d. 1927), the sociologist Giuseppe Toniolo (d. 1918), Pier Giorgio Frascati (d. 1925), Giulio Salvadori (d. 1928), and Vico Necchi (d. 1930). There was not, however, the typical French phenomenon of a return of the intellectuals to the faith.

The First World War affected Italian Catholicism in a phase of transition after the dissolution of the Opera dei Congressi (1904), which the anti-Modernist repression followed with the encyclical Pascendi of 1907. In the social sphere Pius X in July 1904 had dissolved the Opera dei Congressi, that organization of intransigence, which for thirty years had coordinated in its five sections almost all Catholic societies of the peninsula and had served as polemical mouthpiece for the protest of the Pope against the Italian government because of its "guilt" in the occupation of the Papal State and in an antiecclesiastical legislation which displayed little feeling of social needs.[5] As soon as it had become clear that the opposition between the Old Guard represented by Ettore Paganuzzi and the new generation embodied by Romolo Murri was unbridgeable and that the democratically minded young people were at the helm, the Pope, by means of the letter of Cardinal Merry del Val, had declared the great central organization, whose president had been named by the Pope, to be dissolved and replaced it by three unions, one for the people, one for the economic-social area, and one for the electoral campaigns, which were now directly subject to the bishops. With this drastic measure, which Monsignore Radini Tedeschi regarded as a catastrophe, the Holy See was pursuing several purposes. It especially disapproved of Murri and his democracy of a Christian stamp, which was based on the autonomy of Catholics in the political sphere. Further, there was an accommodation to the efforts of individual church dignitaries, who wanted to exercise a decisive influence in the Catholic movement. Finally, the suppression of the Opera dei Congressi fitted into the plans of Pius X for a restoration of disciplinary unity and strict "L'anticlericalismo nel socialismo italiano (dalle origini al 1914)," Movimento operaio e socialista 16 (1970), 175–89; A. Azzaroni, Socialisti anticlericali (Florence 1961); G. Verucci, "Valori religiosi e valori laici," Quaderni storici 6 (1972), 543–64; A. M. Mojetta, Cento anni di satira anticlericale nei giornali dal 1860 al 1955 (Milan 1975).

---

[5] On the Opera dei Congressi, see A. Gambasin, L'attività sociale nell' opera dei Congressi (1874–1904) (Rome 1958); G. De Rosa, Storia del Movimento cattolico in Italia, 2 vols. (Bari 1968); F. Candeloro, Il movimento cattolico in Italia, 3d ed. (Rome 1974) (Marxist).

obedience, which not only the theological Modernism of a Buonaiuti had jeopardized, but also the political Modernism of a Murri with his demand for independence from the hierarchy.[6]

In the area of the electoral campaigns the non expedit was weakened. The fear of a strong advance of the Socialists induced Pius X to undertake a dialogue with Giolitti and the moderate liberals, which led to the "Gentiloni Pact" of 1913. Gentiloni, president of the electoral union, promised the votes of the Catholics to those liberal candidates who obliged themselves in writing to respect a few conditions—rejection of divorce, defense of religious instruction in the schools, and so forth. In this way the moderate clerical influence, clerico-moderatismo, was strengthened. Italian Catholicism lived with this divided attitude—disciplinary rigidity on the one side, political opening to the moderate liberals on the other—until it was drawn into the First World War, which also for the Church marked a change in the peninsula.

The bishops at first stood for neutrality, except for a few prelates who subscribed to a nationalistic tendency.[7] However, when on 24 May 1915 the Italian government began hostilities against the Central Powers, obedience to the secular authority caused bishops and people to uphold the war. Only a few isolated personalities, such as the Barnabite Alessandro Chignoni, remained loyal to the pacifist attitude.[8] But there were also only a few of the bishops who succumbed to the temptation to violent reaction and chauvinistic rhetoric.[9]

The war evoked no substantial renewal of faith. The psychologist Father Agostino Gemelli proved that, after a momentary revival of an external piety as a consequence of the anguish at death, a return to indifference can be ascertained.[10] Much more radical was Coenobium, the periodical of the Christian opposition, which branded it a scandal that the "theology of the sword" all too easily justified the war.[11]

---

[6] The basic work on Italian Modernism is P. Scoppola, Crisi modernista e rinnovamente cattolico in Italia (Bologna 1975); the documents of the modernists are published in the annual Fonti e documenti of the University of Urbino, edited by the Centro Studi per la storia del modernismo, first issue in 1972.

[7] P. Scoppola, "Cattolici neutralisti e interventisti alle vigilia del conflitto"; A. Prandi, "La guerra e le sue consequenze nel mondo cattolico italiano"; A. Monticone, "I vescovi italiani e la guerra 1915–1918" (these three essays are in Benedetto XV, I cattolici e la prima guerra mondiale, 95–152, 153–205, 627–59).

[8] A. Chignoni, "Il cristianesimo e la guerra," Coenobium, June–July 1915, October–December 1915; Monsignore Volpi, bishop of Arezzo, remained opposed to the war, apparently not so much because of pacific convictions as out of sympathy for Catholic Austria; cf. Monticone, op. cit., 641.

[9] The nationalist terminology speaks of the "secular decisions of Italy's destiny," calls independence to mind with rhetorical phrases, and designates the Mother of God as "protector of Italy"; if the nationalist bishops constituted only an unimportant minority, they still had a much greater echo, because the press and the official propaganda emphasized them; cf. Monticone, op. cit., 635–37.

The reliable support of the Italian Church for the government and the active participation in the fatherland's war was for the Catholics the signal for the ending of the opposition to the state and their entry into politics. In an effort to sanction this new line, Don Luigi Sturzo (d. 1959) in 1919 created the Partito Popolare Italiano, and the Holy See abolished its non expedit. This new political formation, which had been preceded by the founding of the Confederazione Italiana dei Lavoratori, with a Christian outlook, warred against the liberal state; it denounced its excessive centralization and its slight respect for the freedom of teaching and for local autonomy.

Because its registered members were recruited especially from the rural classes, Sturzo's union took up the agrarian question, for which it advocated a bold reform program—partition of the latifundia with extensive cultivation, promoting of small ownership. It cultivated good-neighbor relations with the moderate trade unions, which were against indiscriminate strikes, especially the political, and occupation of factories. In coordination with the Socialists and at the same time with them it led a decisive fight for the eight-hour day and realized some social demands—ownership of stock and share in profits by workers, legal recognition and equality of rights for all union organizations. Although the Popular Party had originated in an openly declared social orientation, it fought the anarchist violence of the Socialist extremists, but could also not realize collaboration with Socialists in the government: attempts at this in 1921 failed not on social questions, but on the school problem and in 1924 because of the veto of the Holy See. In connection with Sturzo's initiative the political autonomy of Catholics vis-à-vis the hierarchy constituted the most important innovation. Although the Popular Party wanted to be the voice for the democratic appeal of the Catholics, it developed nondenominationally. Cardinal Gasparri repeatedly declared that the new union arose "without the intervention of the Holy See" from the consistent effort of the Catholic movement for adaptation to democratic society, in which each interest was promoted by the activity of the interest groups of the moment. Benedict XV had facilitated such a process, which surpassed the political-religious exaggeration of the Opera dei Congressi and its successor societies, by separating the field of politics from that of religion. While the new party organism did not present itself as the absolute final stage for the realization of political unity among Catholics, in reality, because of the special circumstances, it embraced almost the entire majority of Catholicism; the unanimous uniting of the Catholics on the political level had been caused by the necessity of reacting against the antipapal and anticlerical spirit of the other parties. Decidedly and incessantly Don Sturzo championed the autonomous role of the Catholic layman, who should act in the secular sphere freely and courageously with personal responsibility and not as the standing army of the hierarchy.

---

[10] A. Gemelli, Il nostro soldato (Milan 1917), 132f.; cf. also his article "Il nostro programma e la nostra vita," Vita e Pensiero 1 (1916), no. 1.

[11] A. Prandi, op. cit., 174; cf. also the article by A. M., "I cleri di tutte le nazioni di fronte alla guerra mondiale," Coenobium 1, July 1918.

Although socialists and liberals fought it, the Popular Party gained sympathy in the elections of 1919 and acquired 100 delegates' seats, whose number grew two years later to 107, when the threatening spectre of Fascism had already appeared in the country. Don Sturzo was among the first to understand the incompatibility of the Gospel with the Fascist regime, that regime which embodied the pagan idolatry of the state, the antievangelical principle of power, and the Machiavellian spirit.[12] In November 1922 the Popular Party sought cooperation with the Fascists in the government in an effort to guide it into a normal liberal channel. However, it was at once expelled by Mussolini when in April 1923 he had set foot on the crooked path of despotism, and, like all democratic formations, was suppressed. Together with other like-minded persons, such as Ferrari, Donati, and others, Don Sturzo had to leave the country. De Gasperi was jailed. Only a very few former adherents of the Popular Party, so-called clerical Fascists, joined the dictatorship. The mass of Catholics was divided into two groups. Some participated actively, even though they remained in Italy, in the secret struggle of antifascism, especially in the group of the Guelfs, led by Malvestiti at Milan and in several other cities, under Alcide De Gasperi and Igino Giordani in Rome, and under Guido Gonella and other leaders of the resistance. The majority belonged to Catholic Action, which, with considerable difficulty, was able to survive as the place for exclusively religious instruction and as a nursery for the future. It would have been almost impossible that the Catholic world of Italy should have adapted itself to Fascism, which was based on a party program hostile to the Church and had a large number of rabid anticlericals in its ranks.

---

[12] L. Sturzo, Pensiero antifascista (Turin 1925); Sturzo's hostility to Mussolini showed even in the single meeting which he had with him in 1921; cf. S. Tramontin, "Mussolini la questione romana e i rapporti con i popolari in un documento inedito," Humanitas 24 (1970), 469–75.

The founder of Fascism came from the Romagna and in 1919 had appeared on an election list together with Podrecca, the head of the most powerfully anticlerical-oriented newspaper, Asino. Perhaps he was favored by the fact that he was originally guided by no precisely defined doctrine. Fascism originated in 1919 under the auspices of change and demand for action. After Mussolini had in 1914 abandoned socialism, which represented neutrality, and was converted to interventionism, he more and more moved toward the right, where he found the assistance of the nationalists, of the middle class, and finally also of the upper middle-class strata and of the landed proprietors. He did not have the sympathy of the Catholics, who even energetically fought him with the aid of the Popular Party. Mussolini's tactical skill was, like his political sagacity and his ability to enthuse the masses, equal to the most sophisticated Machiavellianism. He understood that he could not consolidate the power seized on 28 October 1922 by an extraparliamentary route without coming to an accommodation with the Church. At once, in 1923, although he at the same time expelled the Popular Party from his cabinet, he gained the hierarchy by some concessions in favor of denominational schools and other concessions. Many Catholics gradually put aside their mistrust and drew closer to the new regime, to which they attributed the merit of restoring order and the forcible suppression of socialist violence. And the struggle against the Freemasons and liberalism was a good deed in the eyes of the Catholic public. True, the Fascist shocktroops were guilty of crimes by invading Socialist party headquarters and clubs of Catholic Action, murdering the Socialist deputy Giacomo Matteotti in June 1924, and beating Don Minzoni, pastor of Argenta in the Romagna, to death.[13] But the middle-class circles made small gangs of thieves responsible for such criminal deeds, and these were not identified with Mussolini's movement. Thus is to be explained why the Holy See abandoned the Popular Party completely and undertook direct discussions with Mussolini for the solution of the Roman Question. The Duce made use of the opportunity and was happy to show himself very generous with privileges in order to end the strife between Church and state, which neither Cavour in 1860 nor Crispi in 1887 nor Orlando in 1919 had been able to settle.[14]

Almost all bishops welcomed the concluding of the Lateran Treaties on 11 February 1929 as an important event; Cardinal Ascalesi of Naples characterized Mussolini as the renewer of Italy. But not all Catholics agreed with this. Father Giulio Bevilacqua, who lived at Rome in the house of Monsignore G. B. Montini, did not conceal his dismay over the unexpected and regrettable news that the Church had implicitly gone security for a despotism. The priest complained especially of the Fascist violence to which he had himself fallen victim at Brescia and which was opposed to Christian gentleness. He surely could approve neither the dealing with the human person as a mere instrument nor the state's monopoly of the education of youth.[15] De Gasperi, on the other hand, who had only recently emerged from Fascist prison, expressly distinguished between the treaty, which he evaluated positively because it put an end to any claims of the secular power, and the concordat, which he regarded as dangerous because of the possibility of a secret understanding between Church and dictatorship.[16]

---

[13] L. Bedeschi, Don Minzoni il prete ucciso dai fascisti (Milan 1973); AA. VV., Antifascisti cattolici (Vicenza 1968) (contains writings of Bishop Rodolfi and of Don Mazzolari and Ferrari).

[14] F. Margiotta-Broglio, Italia e S. Sede dalla grande guerra alla Conciliazione (Bari 1966).

But the scruples of this élite did not prevent the Italian people in the plebiscite of March 1929 from sanctioning Fascism with 9 million votes in contrast to only 135,000 "no" votes. A further occasion for enthusiasm offered itself in 1936 when Italy occupied Ethiopia. A year earlier, on 28 October, Cardinal Schuster in a sermon in the Milan cathedral had sung a paean of praise to what seemed to him as a campaign of evangelization and a work of Christian civilization for the good of Ethiopian barbarians—the same cardinal who, three years later, attacked the regime because of the racial laws which crushed Christian universalism. It was not difficult for Mussolini to represent the enterprise in Spain as a holy crusade against atheistic Bolshevism.

There can be no question that Catholicism and Fascism existed side by side in the best understanding; it must rather be established that the Catholic consensus was of a passive rather than an active nature and was again and again interrupted by many acts of opposition. Catholic Action and especially Youth Action can be seen as controverted points. In ARTICLE 43 the concordat recognized the organizations belonging to Catholic Action insofar as their activities took place outside political parties and under direct dependence on the church hierarchy and for the realization of Catholic principles. What was then the real attitude of the Catholic movement in regard to the dictatorship? The evaluation of contemporaries is varied. Giuseppe della Torre, chief editor of Osservatore Romano, wrote that the meeting between Fascism and Catholic Action was a collision. On the other hand, De Gasperi spoke of the "pitiful spectacle" which some top leaders offered to their associations by their too broad compromises. In reality, the movement with its organizations in four divisions—male youth, female youth, men, women—with its registered members presented a power factor in regard to numbers which could not but arouse the suspicion of the regime. Open battle broke out in the spring of 1931. Mussolini was suspicious that Catholic Action wanted to take the place of the Popular Party and therefore dissolved 5,000 groups of male and 10,000 groups of female youth with a total of 800,000 members.[17] [15] G. Bevilacqua, Scritti tra le due guerre, E. Gianmancheri, ed., (Brescia 1968); A. Fappani, P. Giulio Bevilacqua prete e cardinale sugli avamposti (Verona 1975).

---

[16] A. De Gasperi, Lettere sul Concordato (Brescia 1970).

He had thereby severely hit those whom Pius XI had designated as his most loyal adherents. The attitude of the Italian episcopate hardened for several months. Pius XI let Mussolini know through Father Tacchi-Venturi that after long reflection and hesitation he was now convinced that he must censure Fascism, which he then branded in the encyclical Non abbiamo bisogno of 29 June 1931 as a pagan idolatry of the state. After a first phase of open opposition the desire not to destroy peaceful coexistence prevailed. On 2 September an agreement was signed which confirmed the right to life of Catholic Action in keeping with ART. 43 of the concordat, but at the same time laid down some restrictive measures: The organization had to limit its field of activity to the purely religious sphere; all associations on the diocesan level were placed under the bishop's responsibility, whereby they were cut off from the central direction.

After the crisis of 1931 Italian Catholicism experienced no further shocks. The majority of the episcopate had a benevolent attitude toward the regime, except for some basically antifascist-minded bishops—Gaggia at Brescia, Elia della Costa at Padua and then at Florence, Endrici at Trent. But sympathy never passed to complete reconciliation. No Italian bishop made the Fascist ideology his own. If the bishops were accommodating to Mussolini in words, they could never be designated as "Fascist" in the sense that they had made compromises with the main ideological theses of Fascism; rather, one could speak of an a-Facist episcopate.[18]

The episcopate was oriented extensively in the spirit of the concordat, which recognized the validity in civil law of religious weddings, introduced Catholic religious instruction in all schools, except the universities, and accepted some typical aspects of the Christian state.[19] On this foundation there developed a pastoral practice which made harmony between civil and canon law its pivotal point—religion of the state, defense of morality, families of many children. The coexistence of the Church with Fascism had, however, only externally the appearance of an agreement; in reality, the basic dissent continued, and each tried to gain the greatest advantage in regard to the other side.[20] In fact, no convinced Catholic occupied a leading position in the regime, just as no Fascist of the first hour was permitted greater responsibility in Catholic Action.

---

[17] A. Martini, Studi sulla questione romana e la Conciliazione (Rome 1963), illustrates also the history of the origin of the Lateran Treaties and the conflict of 1931 and the final battle of Pius XI in 1938 on the occasion of the race laws.

[18] S. Tramontin, Cattolici popolari fascisti nel Veneto (Rome 1975); R. Moro, "Afascismo e antifascismo nei movimenti intellectuali di Azione Cattolica dopo il '31," Storia Contemporanea 6 (1975), 733–801.

[19] G. Martina, "I cattolici di fronte al fascismo," Rassegna di Teologia 17 (1976), 170–94.

After years of a doubtful modus vivendi there occurred in 1938 the definitive break, when Mussolini, even though in moderate form, imitated Hitler in the persecution of Jews. Bishops such as Schuster or Nasalli-Rocca, who had sympathized with the activity of the dictatorial Italian regime, heartily concurred with Pius XI when on Christmas Eve he thanked the "most noble ruler" and his "incomparable" prime minister for the religious peace in Italy, but then immediately in his address complained of the bad handling of Catholic Action and the violation of the marriage regulations of the concordat by the racial laws.

Italy's participation in the war on Hitler's side contributed likewise to the cooling of relations between the Church and Fascism. The clergy became still more hostile to and distrustful of the Social Republic of Italy, which, under the protection of Hitler's arms, Mussolini established on 8 September 1943 and which the Holy See never recognized.[21] When in the last phase of the Second World War the mass of Catholics held themselves aloof from Fascism, the active minority of anti-Fascist Catholics, which hitherto had fought in secrecy, rose in armed resistance[22] and then established the Democrazia Cristiana.

At the end of the Second World War there occurred in Italy a first phase of religious revival, which took place on the three levels of politics, organization, and piety. These levels were closely united and resulted from different factors: from a defensive attitude supported by concern in regard to the Communist Party and the laicized culture; from the idea that Italy must be defended as an officially Catholic country; finally, from an understanding of the Church with a hierarchical structure in the shape of a pyramid instead of a communio.[23]

---

[20] Don Primo Mazzolari, who was an irreconcilable opponent of Fascism; cf. P. Mazzolari, Diario e lettere (1905–1972), A. Bergamaschi, ed., (Bologna 1974).

[21] Riservato a Mussolini, Notiziari giornalieri della Guarda Nazionale repubblicana novembre 1943–giugno 1944 (Milan 1974).

[22] M. Bendiscioli, Antifascismo e Resistenza, 2d ed. (Rome 1974); R. A. Webster, La croce e i fasci (Milan 1964), is informed in the historical area, but shows only incomplete knowledge of Catholic doctrine.

[23] The most effective synthesis comes from G. Martina, La chiesa in Italia negli ultimi trent'anni (Rome 1977).

With the collapse of Fascism on 25 April 1945 there was presented the problem of the succession to the regime. De Gasperi united in himself the hope of the liberal and also of the social Catholics and wanted to avoid a return to the "historical railing," storico steccato, hence the frontal opposition between Catholics and laicists. And so he sought to direct the political experience of Italy in the democratic sense to a party which could be the guarantee of the value of freedom and of political pluralism. But the parties of the left—Giuseppe Dossetti, Giorgio La Pira—objected to De Gasperi's line and complained that the Democrazia Cristiana had actually become a party of order and was not sufficiently committed in the social sphere.

The "Christian Democratic hegemony" served to defend civil and religious freedoms. The political unity of the Catholics was partly destroyed by the "Communist Catholics," namely, Felice Balbo, Franco Rodano, and Gabriele de Rosa,[24] a tiny minority, which opposed the fact that many Catholic workers opted for the extreme left. From the viewpoint of organization and numbers, Catholic Action represented an imposing power in the first postwar years. The number of registered members increased in the unions of men from 150,866 in 1946 (with 6,140 groups) to 285,455 in 1954 (with 12,224 groups). The unions of women, divided in 1946 among 10,389 and in 1954 among 16,389 groups, grew from 369,015 members in the period after the war to 597,394 in 1954. The male youths embraced 9,951 groups—5,504 urban and 4,447 rural—while their total number in 1954 had jumped to 15,709—6,472 urban and 9,237 rural groups; the number of members rose from 367,392 to 556,752 in 1954. The female youth constituted the imposing branch: in 1946 there were 13,898 groups among them, in 1954 there were 19,026; the number of members in the respective years rose from 884,992 to 1,215,977.[25]

The religious upsurge was conditioned by the political struggle. Catholic Action seemed to become a reservoir of the leadership cadres for the Democrazia Cristiana. Besides initiatives of a social sort, in connection with which one thinks especially of Carlo Gnocchi (d. 1952), those with a more political character appeared, as, for example, the civic committees, comitati civici.[26] The decisive points of spirituality in the parishes were the cult of the Eucharist and of the Mother of [24] S. Tramontin, Sinistra cattolica di ieri e di oggi (Turin 1974); N. Antonetti, L'ideologia della sinistra cristiana. I cattolici tra chiesa e comunismo (1937–45), (Milan 1976); G. Campanini, Fede e politica 1943–1951. La vicenda ideologica della sinistra D.C. (Brescia 1976).

---

[25] Annuario dell'Azione Cattolica Italiana (Rome 1954).

[26] G. Baget-Bozzo, Il partito cristiano al potere. La DC di De Gasperi e di Dossetti, 2 vols. (Florence 1974).

God—especially typical in the postwar period were Marian pilgrimages—and marks of honor for the Pope. The traditional pilgrimages, whose centers had been at Loreto and Pompeii, were increased by new centers, as, for example, to San Giovanni Rotondo by Father Pio of Pietralcina (d. 1968) and to Syracuse. The apostolate of Father Riccardo Lombardi also found many collaborators; its goal was to proclaim Christianity in the "Crusade of Goodwill" and "Center of the Better World" as the sole alternative to the modern world.[27]

But the cultural impetus was almost totally absent. There was a lack of centers for investigation and for general cultural initiatives. The book market itself preferred the production of edifying literature and the translating of foreign works.[28] Italy encountered great difficulties with theological renewal. The series of biblical works directed by Salvatore Garofalo was begun in 1947 with outdated programs. Also typical was the aversion to Jacques Maritain's integral humanism. Nevertheless there occurred, even if only with severe efforts, a freeing of Italian theological culture from provincialism in the years after 1960, thanks to foreign influence. To be mentioned as especially vital centers are: Turin with Michele Pellegrino, Milan with Carlo Colombo, Brescia with the publishing house Morcelliana, Father Giulio Bevilacqua (d. 1965), Mario Bendiscioli at Milan, Bologna with the Centro di Documentazione di Scienze Religiose founded by Giuseppe Dossetti, and Rome with Giuseppe De Luca. Two "obedient prophets" especially played the most important roles in the process of fermentation in Italian Catholicism: Primo Mazzolari and Lorenzo Milani.[29]

In the first years after 1900 persons were of the opinion that a specially important role had to be attributed to a university for Italian Catholics. The long-desired institution became a reality in 1921 and was the work of the converted Franciscan, Agostino Gemelli (d. 1959), assisted by Armida Barelli (d. 1952) and Vico Necchi. The Catholic University of the Sacred Heart aimed in the sphere of higher culture to emphasize the ideal of a free school and a Christian culture.

---

[27] P. Lombarde, Per un mondo nuovo (Rome 1951); idem, Esercitazioni per un mondo migliore (Rome 1958).

[28] As late as 1974 there were 231 translations of 593 works of a theological character (cf. Annuario delle statistiche culturali 15 [1974], 31).

[29] P. Mazzolari, La chiesa, il fascismo, la guerra (Florence 1966); A. Bergamaschi, Un contestatore di tutte le stagioni (Bologna 1968); idem, P. Mazzolari nello scandalo di "Adesso" (Turin 1968); L. Bedeschi, Obbedientissimo in Cristo. Lettere di don Primo Mazzolari al suo vescovo 1917–1959 (Milan 1974). Characteristic for Milani is the changing fate of his book, Esperienze pastorali (Florence 1957). Concerning him, cf. N. Fallaci, Dalla parte dell'ultimo, vita del prete Lorenzo Milani, 3d ed. (Milan 1974); F. Tognaccini, "Don Milano nell'evoluzione dell'opinione pubblica," Testimonianze 18 (1975), 97–108.

The purpose of this institution was the founding of a center for the creating of an organic culture, in a sense of a new Summa of knowledge, the educating of the leading classes of the country, and the freeing of the new generation from the influence of the laicized and unbelieving state school. Gemelli saw himself faced with the choice between the French model of a university completely free from the state's sphere of influence and the model of Louvain. Thanks to support by Benedetto Croce and Giovanni Gentile, he obtained state approval in 1924, which, it is true, meant a partial diminution of autonomy, but also a valuable official recognition. Later, other decisions had to be made, such as were determined by the chronic economic difficulties, and a choice had to be made between a university for the masses or for an elite. Around 1931 the ideological pluralism was restricted. But altogether the balance for the first half-century of existence was positive in regard to the level of scholarly production, while the ideal of an all-embracing education and not only one limited to the professions was only partly achieved. The reasons for this were: the lack of a faculty of theological sciences—a department for religious sciences was only established in 1969—the excessive number of students, the effects of the struggle against modernists, the absence of qualified Catholics in critical fields of scholarship.[30]

Around 1960 Italian society underwent radical changes: a rapid industrialization, a doubling of the per capita income between 1950 and 1970, a decline of those occupied in agriculture—from 42.2 percent in 1951 to 17.3 in 1971—a powerful and chaotic displacement of great masses of people from the south to the north and from country to city. Now arose the mass university. The number of students increased from 210,228 in 1955 to 886,894 in 1974–75. The considerable increase of votes for parties of the left proceeded along with a noticeable loss to the Democrazia Christiana—from a majority in 1948 to 38.3 percent in 1963—and so the "Opening to the left" had to take place, that is, an alliance of the Catholic Party with the Socialists. At the time the political power of the unions also grew.

The religious situation, of which one could have made a snapshot for the period before 1962 at the traditionalist Roman Synod held by John XXIII, changed fundamentally. Of course, this was not true of the institutional sphere, which remained for the most part unchanged. In 1974 there were 284 dioceses, 41,700 diocesan priests, 21,069 religious priests, 5,843 lay brothers, and 150,179 nuns. The vocation crisis caused the number of priestly ordinations to drop from 955 in 1964 to 759 in 1969. The number of inhabitants per parish rose between 1964 and 1969 from 1,965 to 2,179. In the rise the presence of the Church was felt in the various sections of welfare—in 1964 there were 4,181 institutes, in 1969 there were 4,565—and of the educational system—3,825 institutions in 1964 and 7,001 in 1969.[31] Meanwhile, the Italian episcopate succeeded, with the founding of the Italian Episcopal Conference in 1969, in working out uniform pastoral guidelines.

---

[30] G. Rumi, "Padre Gemelli e l'Università Cattolica," AA. VV., Modernismo, fascismo, comunismo . . . , G. Rossini, ed. (Bologna 1972), 204–33; M. Sticco, Appunti per una biografia di un uomo difficile (Milan 1974).

The crisis of the postconciliar period had significant effects in Italy also. The Catholic association system suffered an obvious setback at the end of the 1960s. The crisis had already advertised itself when Carlo Caretto in 1952 and then Mario Rossi (d. 1976) in 1954 withdrew because they were not in agreement with the conservative political line followed by President General Luigi Gedda.[32] After 1968 pressure to spontaneous actions reduced the maneuverability of the movement in the extreme.

The critical situation of the Catholic world was revealed also in the political sphere by the increase of votes for the Communist Party and by the turning of declared Catholic representatives such as Paolo Brezzi and Raniero La Valle to this party, which made questionable the very existence of a Catholic Party. The present situation was also made more difficult by the seething of ecclesiastical cases of conflict, such as the Isolotto Congregation and Abbot Franzoni. The referendum for the abolition of divorce ended with a victory of 59.26 percent for the advocates of divorce as opposed to 40.74 percent for its opponents, and placed before the Catholic world the much greater problem of how in a pluralistic society Christian ideals can be assured.[33]

---

[31] Segretaria di Stato, Raccolta di tavole statistiche (Vatican City 1971ff.).

[32] M. Rossi, I giorni dell'onnipotenza. Memoria di un'esperienza cattolica (Rome 1975).

[33] The following can be established as positive: the development of the secular institutes, new movements such as the Focolari and Communione e Liberazione, and the new Catholic Action and the central groups of the new Pentecostal and Catechumen Movements. Cardinal Giacomo Lercaro (d. 1976), one of the promoters of the reform of the liturgy, deserves a special place among the most important figures of the latest history.

CHAPTER 21

*The Catholic Church of France

The denunciation of the concordat in 1905 produced between Rome and the Church of France a more intimate relationship than ever before.

---

* Pierre Blet, S. J.

In addition, the accessions of Benedict XV and Pius XII roughly coincided with the outbreak of the two world wars, which had an impact on the interior life of the French Church. And so it is admissible to divide this latest sector in the life of French Catholicism according to the three pontificates of Benedict XV, Pius XI, and Pius XII.

Under Benedict XV

The state of war in which France was placed by the declaration of war of 3 August 1914 hastened considerably a development already begun in the ecclesiastical situation of France. The Dreyfus Affair had shown that the Catholics, whom patriotic republicans had long charged with placing the interests of the Church above those of the nation, stood in the front line of patriots, that is, of nationalists.[1] At that time the radical left represented pacifist tendencies, and the relations of the Catholics with the government were thereby not better. The voting on the law for the introduction of a three-year period of military service in August 1913 had made it clear: this very republican government had understood that it had to do something better than devote itself to the excluding of clerical influence. The declaration of war strengthened this tendency: in view of the threat to the country's frontiers, clericalism ceased to be the chief enemy. This change was expressed on both sides in concrete actions: priests and seminarians submitted with enthusiasm to the general obligation to military service, and the expelled religious returned in order to comply with the mobilization order, pastors prevented by age preached from the pulpit the duty to obey the induction order and make the financial sacrifices caused by the war. For his part, Minister of the Interior Malvy suspended the implementation of the laws of 1905 against the property of religious communities that had not yet been liquidated.

Influential Catholics, including prelates such as Monsignore Baudrillart, established a Catholic committee for the support of French foreign propaganda with the aid of brochures and lectures. These were especially intended for Catholic countries such as Spain and Latin America, where the anticlerical policy of the government had greatly reduced French influence. Of course, anticlericalism did not entirely disappear. It continued during the war in connection with the diplomatic exertions of Benedict XV for ending the "unnecessary shedding of blood"; the Vatican was presented as a power which absolutely favored the Central Powers. The French Catholics now aimed to demonstrate that they kept themselves aloof from the papal policy.

---

[1] R. Rémond, La droite et les droites en France.

Thus the Dominican Father Sertillanges proclaimed in a sermon, whose text the cardinal archbishop of Paris had censured, from the pulpit of Notre-Dame in Paris: "Most Holy Father, we cannot comply with your words of peace to the present. We are sons who say "no, no. . . ."[2] But still more than through such sensational rhetoric, the Catholics and their clergy were freed from any doubt as to their patriotic devotion by the spectacle which 25,000 priests, religious, and seminarians called to military service offered, half of whom accepted misery in the trenches, and 4,608 of whom never returned.[3]

The comradeship which had united pastor and teacher in the slime of the trenches and under the bombardment of cannon left lasting impressions. On the day of demobilization many participants in the war returned with the determination to preserve "the sanctified union." Clemenceau could still conduct the negotiations at Versailles in a spirit which was as hostile to the Holy See as to the Habsburg Monarchy. But the elections of 1919 produced a majority of moderates in the Chamber of Deputies, who were opponents of the sectarian laws from the beginning of the century. Of course, these laws could not be revised, for the Senate remained under the influence of the radical party; but when Clemenceau became a candidate for president of the republic in the elections, the nationalists made him atone for his obdurate anticlericalism: they preferred Deschanel, and Clemenceau left politics.

It was known that Clemenceau was against restoration of diplomatic relations with the Holy See; but the experience of the war had taught that it was a disadvantage for France to have no such connection as an embassy at the Vatican represented. Besides, the reversion to France of the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, to which in 1871 Bismarck had allowed the status of the Napoleonic concordat, raised questions which demanded dialogue with the Holy See; for the generals and the first high commissioners had promised to the Alsatians and Lorrainers the maintenance of their religious status. In order to keep their word, people had to renounce the principles of centralizing Jacobinism and laicism and grant that the two provinces retain their regime in accord with the concordat, that priests there be paid by the state, and that the school remain denominational. The government of the Republic had to begin conversations with Rome and resume from the break of 1905. The representative of the law of separation, Aristide Briand, was one of the first to express himself for the reestablishing of a French embassy at the Holy See, and many members of the former government shared his opinion. The Catholics worked for the realization of this project, and the Holy See showed itself to be very accommodating. However, the idea encountered the resistance of anticlerical opponents and also did not find the good will of the extreme right, who saw in it a sort of recognition of the hateful regime by the Holy See. Nevertheless, the project, which included the reestablishing of an embassy at the Holy See and the installing of a nuncio at Paris, was approved by the Chamber of Deputies, but rejected by the Senate. When Aristide Briand became president of the council, he nevertheless on 17 May 1921 named Jonnart as French ambassador to the Holy See, and the new president of the Republic, Deschanel, in July accepted the credentials of Nuncio Ceretti.[4]

---

[2] A. Dansette, Histoire religieuse de la France, contemporaine sous la III^e republique, 490f.

[3] R. Rémond, Histoire du Catholicisme en France. La période contemporaine, 558f.

The resumption of diplomatic relations with the Vatican neither allowed the restoration of the concordat nor improved the material situation which the expropriations since 1905 had created. Nevertheless, Benedict XV conceded to the French government a right in regard to the naming of bishops: the Holy See would communicate to the Quai d'Orsay at the proper time the name of the newly chosen before publication in order to accommodate, if necessary, objections of a political sort that might occur.[5] Only in the dioceses of Strasbourg and Metz did the concordat remain in force, whereby the French government had the right of nominating.

After these first agreements, discussions were resumed in order to create a basic juridical situation for the value of church property in France. The Church societies rejected by Pius X could be taken into consideration in so far as they were founded on the basis of the agreements which had been worked out between the Church and the state, and with the presupposition that the authority of the hierarchy was assured. Nevertheless, with all respect the French bishops opposed an agreement which seemed to contradict the rejection which Pius X had imposed on them little more than ten years earlier. The acceptance of new societies, named diocesan societies, was the act of Pius XI, the new Pope. In 1924 he declared that he agreed that in each diocese a society should be founded under the presidency of the bishop to administer church property and to accept foundations and legacies.[6]

Under Pius XI

This regulation contained no compensation for the expropriations of 1905, it even left religious buildings in the ownership of political communities and contained assurance neither for the Christian school nor the religious orders. Hence it was unable to arouse any enthusiasm among the faithful, who declared "war against laicism and its principles even to the annulment of the unjust laws which proceeded from them."

---

[4] A. Dansette, op. cit., 502–5.

[5] R. Rémond, Histoire du Catholicisme, 565.

[6] A. Dansette, op. cit., 505–10.

People were already on the eve of an election in which an anticlerical left and a right allied with the Church opposed each other. The vote of May 1924 was in favor of the alliance concluded between the radicals and the socialists and elevated Édouard Herriot to the position of president of the Council. For a moment people believed that the age of Combes had returned: the head of the government announced that he intended to abolish the embassy at the Holy See and would invoke the expulsion laws against religious, who had returned to France as a result of the mobilization; Herriot also promised that he would enforce the laicization laws in the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. But he ran into an opposition which he had not foreseen. The Fédération Nationale Catholique, whose president was General de Castelnau, organized protest meetings, and the Freemasons were accused of having conspired at the same time against the Church and against French unity. The Alsatians and Lorrainers publicly expressed the desire that the promises in regard to worship and school should be kept. The religious threatened with explusion loudly pointed out their character as war veterans and through the pen of Father Doncoeur cried out the eventually famous: "We will not go!" The succeeding financial crisis put an end to the left coalition and made it understood that in 1925 anticlericalism had lost its impetus in the election struggles.

Of course, this did not absolutely prove that France had again become Christian: in wide areas of the population indifference took the place of hostility to religion. True, religious events such as the pilgrimage to Lourdes, the celebrations at the canonization of Joan of Arc,[7] and a little later the pilgrimages to Lisieux brought together passionately committed believers, as was also true of the rallies of the Fédération Nationale Catholique. Religious practice made progress in the middle class and especially among students and at the big schools. As forerunner of the Jeunesse Étudiante Catholique (JEC) in 1929 the Fédération Française des Étudiants Catholiques from 1922 on founded local groups. But apart from this elite there were, as is well known, large groups in the population that had been educated outside the Church in the laicized schools. The Association Catholique de la Jeunesse Française continued its work in order to prepare its members for civic activity in the future. The Semaines Sociales carried their educational work further in order to inform the Catholics on the social doctrine of the Church and its effects. For the same end the Action Populaire, which had moved from Rheims to Paris in 1919, improved its publications. The Confédération Française des Travailleurs Chrétiens worked to unite all unions to which all wage earners in commerce and industry belonged, and in 1920 it already had 140,000 members.[8]

---

[7] Ibid., 503.

Nevertheless, many Catholics saw in the removal of the Freemasonic and anticlerical Republic the basic assumption for the return of France to the faith of the Fathers. The alliance between nationalism and Catholicism, consolidated by the war, found embodiment in the movement of the Action Française, whose changing fate had serious consequences. There was a unique alliance between the leader of Action Française, Charles Maurras, who was a pupil of Auguste Comte, and the conservative Catholics who joined his movement. But Maurras declared all agents of de-Christianization, rationalists, Freemasons, and Protestants to be enemies of the French nation and extolled Roman Catholicism as the necessary foundation for the reconstruction of the monarchy. Action Française found in the Catholic area, in youth, in universities and seminaries, in the religious orders, and even in the body of bishops an assent which to a degree inclined to enthusiasm.

This influence of a movement which glorified nationalism, which made no secret of its aim to unite the Catholics against the Republic, met the resistance of democratic Catholics. It was also unable to obtain the assent of Pius XI, who was seeking a reconciliation with the Republic. Moreover, the personal attitude of Maurras and his slogan "Politics in First Place" urged caution. The first warning, which came from France at Rome's demand, was a letter of the archbishop of Bordeaux, Cardinal Andrieux, of 25 August 1926. The letter contained gross distortions, it is true, but nevertheless Pius XI gave it his general assent.[9] But at the same time it became known that several books by Maurras had been put on the Index, a decision which was under way as early as 1911 but which had again and again been postponed by Pius X and Benedict XV. Immediate violent counterattacks of Action Française were answered by Rome with sanctions: On 29 December 1926 the reading of the newspaper of Action Française and membership in this union were entirely forbidden. The consequence of disobedience was refusal of the sacraments, and priests who absolved those not repentant became reserved cases ratione sui. The leaders of Action Française characterized these measures as the result of a plot which had been contrived for the advantage of democracy and Germany, and with their anticlericalism they competed with the radicals, who were otherwise attacked by them. Some Catholics appealed to the freedom of political opinion to disregard the Roman prohibitions. The directive for the refusal of the sacraments was often ignored but also often applied with a severity which exceeded the intentions of the instructing office. In the clergy and the religious orders the condemnation of Action Française not only involved the retirement of Cardinal Billot but also the withdrawal of a whole class of leaders and the election of new men,[10] who were not prepared for the functions they had to assume.

---

[8] R. Rémond, Histoire du Catholicisme, 583.

[9] A. Dansette, op. cit., 583f.

In 1927 Father Lhande published his book, Le Christ dans le Banlieu. In it he revealed to the faithful and even to the clergy of the capital that in the immediate geographical neighborhood, namely, in the midst of their own parishes, existed masses of people to whom the Church was not only foreign but entirely unknown. The construction association, founded by the new archbishop, Cardinal Verdier, for the building of churches in the suburbs was not sufficient to alter the situation. At the same time Abbé Guérin, vicar in a workers' parish, obtained knowledge of the Manuel du襤ociste Belge of Abbé Cardijn. He believed that he could find there the solution for the problem of the education of young workers, for that problem to which the Action Catholique de la Jeunesse Française, in his opinion, gave only an insufficient answer. The ACJF, which celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its founding in 1936, invited young workers and young bourgeois to common meetings; but because it aimed chiefly at the formation of a leadership elite, it reached the young workers only with difficulty. Entirely in the meaning of Abbé Cardijn, who had in mind a movement restricted to the working class, young French workers held their first meeting at Clichy in October 1926. The newspaper edited by them, Jeunesse Ouvrière, appeared in January 1927 in its first issue. The movement (JOC) quickly stirred enthusiasm and spread to Lille, Lyon, and Marseille. The hierarchy, with Cardinal Dubois at Paris, assisted by Canon Gerlier as director of the associations, and with Cardinal Liénart at Lille supported the movement. When the "Popular Front" came to power in 1936 and began a movement of strikes and occupation of factories, great hopes were centered on the picked troops of militant adherents of the Christian Young Workers' Movement, Jocists, who defended their rights and those of their worker colleagues, but still always maintained loyalty to the faith and its moral demands. From this moment on, the union of Christian workers acquired a new upsurge; by 1938, 2,400 unions with 500,000 members existed.[11] The celebration of the tenth anniversary of JOC from 16 to 21 July 1937 brought together at Paris ca. 80,000 Jocists and took on the features of a triumph.

---

[10] Ibid., 603.

Long before this success began to be clear, persons began to apply the rules of the workers' movement also to other fields. In 1929 the Jeunesse Agricole Catholique (JAC) joined the ACJF, and now there appeared also the Jeunesse Étudiante Catholique (JEC). The Jeunesse Maritime Catholique (JMC) was founded in 1932, and in 1936 the Jeunesse Indépendante Catholique (JIC). These movements also had female branches and all joined the ACJF, which from then on appeared as a union of autonomous movements under the control of the hierarchy.

Likewise, as the JOC had closely joined the CFTC, the JAC expanded to the Ligue Agricole Chrétienne and soon after to the Farmers' Family Movement, while on the other hand the Action Catholique Indépendante and the Action Catholique Indépendante Feminine and the Mouvement des Ingenieurs et Chefs d'Industrie Catholique formed their counterparts in the middle-class sphere.

The special character of all these movements consisted in their apostolic orientation. The Scout Movement, on the other hand, basically had in view the training of youth, and so its pedagogical method was based on physical activity and a life in the group. In 1938 it had in France and overseas 78,000 young followers and became the nursery for vocations to the priesthood and the religious life.[12] Many scout groups were recruited from the pupils of Catholic high schools, in which vocations found a favorable environment.

While in this period the élan of movements of Catholic Action was well known, still the goal of all zealous exertions of the hierarchy and of all financial sacrifices of the faithful remained the more traditional form of the education of young men in the Christian schools. The laws of 1905 had severely hurt the congregations active in schools but had not changed the legal bases which proclaimed the principle of free instruction, namely the Falloux Law of 15 March 1850 for high school instruction, the law of 12 July 1875 for university instruction, the law of 30 October 1886 for elementary school instruction, and the law of 25 July 1919 for the training of technical experts. But apart from this last-named law, which expressly envisaged the granting of financial aid, this legislation refused any assistance to private education. Hence the faithful united in several associations to defend the existence of Christian schools and demand for them the granting of public assistance. Thus the Alliance des maisons d'education chrétienne, founded in 1872, from which came in 1925 the syndicate of Directeurs et Directrices des maisons d'éducation chrétienne, was involved in the publication of texts for instruction and published its own periodical, L'Enseignement chrétienne; in 1938 1,061 houses belonged to the association.[13] The Association de Chefs de Familles de France aimed to stress the rights of Christian families, loudly proclaimed war against a standardized elementary school, and demanded of candidates in election to the legislative bodies assurances of the intact freedom of instruction.[14] Together with other unions it represented the viewpoint that freedom also presupposed school proportion, that is, the proportional dividing of the sums of money expended for education between the state and the private schools corresponding to the number of pupils.

[11] Annuaire général catholique, 1938, LX.

[12] Ibid. LXXIII.

A first demand in this sense, a projected law with the stipulation that pupils in possession of a scholarship could choose between the two kinds of school, was rejected by the Senate in 1920. The Catholics, encouraged to this by the FNC, insisted on their demand and were, in expectation of this regulation, ready to make considerable financial sacrifices for their schools. The growth of the high school stage between the two world wars achieved a degree that upset the radical left: in 1931 this area included 1,011 high schools with 150,000 pupils in contrast to 560 state high schools or lyceums with 225,000 pupils. In the period from 1930 to 1938 these figures were still higher: 1,271 high schools with 209,460 pupils in 1934–35 and 1,400 high schools with 230,607 pupils in 1937–38.[15]

Despite the retaining of the laicist laws and official neutrality, the feeling of the threat from without, evoked by the remilitarizing of the Rhineland, the Anschluss of Austria to the German Reich, and the expectation of the annexation of Czechoslovakia by Hitler, produced a new rapprochement between the government of the Third Republic and of the Church. A journey of Pope Pius XI to France for the dedication of the basilica of Saint Thérèse de Lisieux was planned. Cardinal Secretary of State Pacelli was received as the Pope's representative[16] in 1937 at Paris and Lisieux with the same honors as were customary for a head of state. Without repudiating its official laicism, the Third Republic came closer to the Church on the brink of its collapse.

---

[13] Ibid. LXVI.

[14] Ibid. LIX.

[15] P. Gerbod, "Les catholiques et l'enseignement secondaire," RHMC XVIII, 391, n. 2.

[16] F. Charles-Roux, Huit ans au Vatican (Paris 1947), 212–37.

Under Pius XII

Two years later, when the diplomatic missions of Cardinal Pacelli to both secular and Catholic France were still remembered, Pacelli was elected as successor of Pius XI on 2 March 1939. This election was greeted in France with enduring satisfaction; for it was known that he would undertake all efforts to save the peace which daily became more fragile. It is true that his offers of mediation in May 1939 with a view to a peace conference (see above, Chapter 3) were without prospects, but he was able to establish another peace through reconciliation with Action Française. In the course of years the leaders of Action Française had understood that they were making a mistake with the precipitate break in relations. On the other side were the penalties which had been imposed on the adherents of Action Française, in clear opposition to the concluding of concordats with the Fascist and Nazi governments, which could be charged with more than mere verbal violence. Pius XI had accepted with kindness the attempts at a rapprochement by Maurras, which the Carmel of Lisieux had suggested, and on 20 October 1938 the committee director of Action Française wrote a letter which was submitted to the Holy Office. The accession of Pius XII was accompanied by no hesitation. George Bonnet, minister for foreign affairs, replied to the nuncio as a result of his inquiry, that this question should be treated exclusively in the religious sphere. Although some bishops expressed hesitations, on 10 July 1939 the Osservatore Romano published the decree of the Holy Office which lifted the excommunication imposed on Action Française at the same moment in which a letter of the periodical disavowed all theories that were contrary to the teachings of the Church. The Second World War was near and created new problems for the Church of France.[17]

The declaration of war of 3 September 1939 proceeded this time from France and England and was the result of the German invasion of Poland, which for its part was a consequence of the Soviet-German nonagression pact. The Catholics were in agreement with the government, and the declaration of war let them see in the war a new crusade against the powers of evil, which Pius XI had unmasked in his two encyclicals against National Socialism and Communism. But the great mass of the population had for a long time lulled itself in the hope that the war of 1914 had been the last of all wars. And so it did not feel again the patriotic élan of August 1914. Priests, religious, and seminarians joined in the mobilization with members of all social strata and there encountered religious indifference and ignorance rather than hostility.

---

[17] A. Dansette, op. cit., 607–11; P. Lesourd, Dossier secret de l'Église de France II, 444–46.

The collapse of June 1940 could not be charged to the Church, which had lost all influence on political and even on public life. Rather it was the Catholics and the military leaders who were inclined to make the laicized school responsible because it had educated the new generations. The collapse again evoked feelings which had temporarily fallen into oblivion because of the harmony between the two powers. Thus preachers pointed out that the defect was God's punishment for the nation's official atheism. But on the other hand they strove to revive hope by indicating that Providence had always had pity on France. Once it had sent the country the eighteen-year-old Joan of Arc, and now it sent Pétain, the eighty-year-old venerable man. The hierarchy, in general very hesitant with its expressions, declared with a certain vigor in regard to the new regime the obligatory loyalty for the government, in which were many Catholics, also through the appeal which the regime directed to the spiritual values, and finally through measures such as the abolition of Freemasonry and especially through a new legislation which corrected the laws of the Third Republic in two essential points, namely, education and religious institutes. A law of April 1942 lifted the prohibition of the orders and provided for a legal recognition of religious communities. The new school laws reintroduced religious instruction in state lyceums and high schools and granted certain financial subsidies to the Christian schools.[18]

Of course the devotion of the clergy to the Vichy regime was not unconditional. Tensions soon arose, and first of all in the education of youth. In a letter to the head of state the bishops protested that the state laid its hand on youth: "A uniform youth—no!" The anti-Semitic policy followed by the occupying power likewise met resistance, which found its formal expression in declarations or letters of the archbishops of Lyon and Toulouse, Gerlier and Saliège, and of Bishop Théas of Montauban. Thus encouraged, many priests, religious, and religious institutions could preserve Jews, especially their children, from deportation. The Service du Travail Obligatoire (STO), that is, the drafting of young French workers for German war industry, created new problems of conscience, for which the church authorities found various solutions.[19] Meanwhile, the religious sentiment awakened by the defeat and the disadvantages of the war called forth mass movements such as that of the Grand Retour: countless faithful from 1943 to 1946 carried a statue of Mary from Boulogne through the whole of France. Millions of pictures and rosaries were distributed, and millions of signatures were collected under the text of the consecration to the Immaculate Heart of Mary.[20] [18] P. Lesourd, op. cit. II, 491f. A law of 1940 annulled that law which forbade religious to give instruction, and which, incidentally, had not been applied since World War I. On 10 March 1941 a law introduced religious instruction on a voluntary basis in state educational institutions. A law of 6 January 1941 conceded to the congregations a contribution to the costs for light, heat, furniture, and mess in private schools. In 1942 and 1943 Catholic and Protestant faculties obtained extraordinary donations.

---

[19] R. Rémond, Histoire du Catholicisme, 611–23. Some religious superiors made the journey to Germany an obligation of conscience for their seminarians. Also the JOC

When in 1944 the provisional government of General de Gaulle abolished the government of Marshal Pétain, the new power in the state aspired to purge the episcopate, which it accused of compliancy toward the Vichy regime. Together with the demand for the recall of Nuncio Valerio Valeri it demanded the resignation of some bishops. Pius XII agreed to replace his nuncio, because there was question of a measure which affected all envoys accredited to the Vichy regime, but he absolutely refused a purge of the episcopate. The new nuncio Angelo Roncalli brought it about that this decision was accepted and resignations were limited to three.[21] From this time on, the French episcopate created for itself a common organization. Since 1919 the cardinals and archbishops had customarily met and on occasion published common statements. Immediately after the Second World War the permanent Secretariat of the Episcopate was established, and finally in 1951 there took place the first plenary meeting of all French bishops.

In public life it was a new phenomenon that declared Catholics participated in the provisional government of General de Gaulle and then in the government of the Fourth Republic, which succeeded it in 1946. Again and again people who came from the ACJF were to be found in ministerial offices in ever quicker succession. Only the Ministry for National Education remained closed to them. The constitution adopted by a bare majority of votes on 13 October 1946 decided anew that the republic was a laicized state and freedom of teaching was excluded from the consitutionally legal freedoms. Nevertheless, the hierarchy, unperturbed, continued the struggle for the free school. As early as 13 March 1946 a declaration of the French cardinals and archbishops affirmed: "The entire French episcopate is determined to maintain the freedom of instruction by all the means at its disposal."[22] expressed itself for the journey out of solidarity with those who had no possibility of avoiding it. Cardinal Liénart declared that it was up to each individual whether to obey the summons, and the ACJF supported resistance, whereby it oriented itself to the numerous "maquis" Catholics. A former member of ACJF later became president of the National Council of the Resistance Movement.

---

[20] R. Rémond, Histoire du Catholicisme, 621.

[21] Ibid., 620.

[22] A. Deroo, L'épiscopat français dans la mêlée de son temps 1930–1954 (Paris 1955), 126f.

In the autumn of 1947 a public demonstration of the French Catholic educational system supplied the opportunity to recall "the complementary service which free instruction does for the country" and it was again emphasized that "justice, freedom, and equality" demand that the Christian school system receive its share in the financial expenditures which the state dispenses for the education of French youth. In the same year the treasury brought suits against the organizers of charity bazaars, which were held to cover school costs. In some cases this brought even bishops to court and thereby gave them the opportunity to call to mind the principles of justice. The politicians could not be entirely deaf to such appeals. In 1948 two decrees empowered state and local commissions to consult on a form of support for free schools. This again called forth the opposition of the entire left, and in some parts of the press were again heard the tones of the old anticlericalism. Despite this, the bishops in 1949 again insisted that "the Christian school is the concern of everyone who is called a Christian," and they admonished parents of their duty to care for a Christian education of their children.[23] Finally a law of 28 September 1951, called Loi Bérangé, granted to free elementary schools a subsidy of thirty-nine francs per year and per pupil as a contribution to the teachers' salary. This law quite obviously did not claim to have solved the school question, but it aimed only to make a beginning.

The new development introduced by this law was the work of the new government, which General de Gaulle had formed on his return to power. A law of 31 December 1959 gave the free schools the choice among four solutions: full integration into the state school, full freedom of the status quo, a social treaty whereby the state would appoint the teachers and lay down the general plans of instruction while undertaking all the costs of instruction, and finally individual treaties according to which the teachers chosen by the school would be subject to the conditions of state examinations and controls and would be paid by the state. In 1966 there were 11,700 institutions with individual treaties and 54,000 high school teachers paid by the state.[24]

These regulations did not silence all discussion of the free school. This type of school met objections from Catholics themselves, not only among those who advocated the state school system, from which they knew that it could give a testimony of great apostolic importance, but also in the clergy itself, where some asked what was to happen with the traditional institutions. These attitudes can be all the better understood when one considers that Catholics not only knew how to succeed in the cultural sphere but even also in the leadership strata of the state universities, which for a long time had with good reason been regarded as an instrument of de-Christianization. The intellectual and scholarly renewal of French Catholicism has since gone beyond the ecclesiastical frontiers. Such large-scale works as the Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France by the abbé and member of the Academy Bremond achieved a great success. The Dictionnaire de Théologie catholique continued the efforts from the first years of this century. In 1937 was begun the scriptural series Unam Sanctam, in which soon appeared the epoch-making Catholicisme by Father de Lubac, and which not long after included the works of Father Congar. The Histoire de l'Église of Fliche and Martin had already begun, and Gilson was publishing his works on the history of Scholasticism, by which even Jacques Maritain was inspired and on which he relied in the investigation of the relations between Christians and modern society, in a perspective moreover that really stood close to that of the periodical Esprit, founded in 1932 by E. Mounier. During the war Fathers de Lubac and Daniélou founded the collection Sources chrétiennes for textual editions and translations of patristic texts, in which soon researchers from the ranks of the diocesan priests and of the orders collaborated with members of the state universities. Only a little later began the collection Théologie.

---

[23] Ibid.

[24] Panorama de la France, 896f.

Obviously, however, these works reached only a restricted elite. Only a few publications with a wider circulation, such as Les Etudes and La Vie Intellectuelle, could obtain a larger public for their investigations, but they caused difficulties and precautions which influenced the encyclical Humani generis of 1950. Other works, on the other hand, served direct practice. Thus in 1930 Gabriel Le Bras had founded in France the sociology of religion in attaching practicing Catholics to various categories according to their belonging to the environment of their native country, their social class, and their professional status. On this line lay also the book Problèmes missionaires de la France rurale, written in 1945 by Abbé Boulart. A less scholarly work in its methods, France pays de mission? had been written by Abbé Godin, and in 1950 it produced as many as 100,000 copies. The presentation of a world which had been formed outside the Church and the problems which this world raised for the Church made a deep impression on Cardinal Suhard, archbishop of Paris from 1940 to 1959. He decided on the founding of a Mission de France together with his interdiocesan seminary at Lisieux. This mission included a program and a special regulation of the phases of education for work in the workers' world. In May 1949 the Mission de France was granted a temporary statute by Rome. Finally an apostolic constitution of 15 August 1954 gave it a clearly defined status: as a prelacy nullius, whose territory was the ancient Cistercian Abbey of Pontigny. In 1955 the mission counted 181 priests.[25]

Cardinal Suhard had also undertaken by way of experiment to allow "worker priests." This initiative was based on various experiences, especially the setbacks in the apostolate in the proletariate environment, the positive experiences of the Dominican Father Loew, who had been a dockworker at Marseille, and of the priests and seminarians who had been drafted for compulsory work during the war. To become workers in order to understand the worker, to make oneself understandable to the worker and to bring him the message of Christ: this was the basic idea which led Cardinal Suhard to permit some priests to take up work in the factories. In 1946 there were six worker priests in Paris and a few others in Provence; in 1947 a group was established at Limoges, and others followed these. There were about ninety worker priests when in 1951 the Holy See ordered the suspension of recruiting. This undertaking had begun with obviously very high-minded priests, but without previously giving them the corresponding preparation, and so it incurred the most serious difficulties. The worker priests saw themselves confronted with a harshness of life they had not imagined; they frequently committed themselves to trade-union actions and in many cases let themselves be gained for the theory of class conflict, while others among them did not know how to maintain their priestly life and celibacy intact. In September 1953 the nuncio Marella informed the bishops that they must recall the priests subject to them, and religious superiors received a corresponding instruction from the Congregation of Religious. At the end of 1956 all religious had obeyed the command to leave, and about forty diocesan priests had likewise submitted, while a somewhat larger number proved by their resistance how urgently necessary Rome's intervention had been.[26]

This was not the end of all efforts of the hierarchy in regard to the apostolate in the workers' world. As early as 1943 Cardinal Suhard had established the Mission de Paris, and in the following October Father Epagneul founded the community of Frères missionaires des campagnes for the rural proletariat.[27] The Fils de la Charité, founded by Father Anizan in 1913, likewise continued their work in this environment. One of them, Abbé Michoneau, in 1946 published the experiences he had had in the five years of his pastoral activity in the parish of Colombes in a book with the programmatic title Paroisse communauté missionaire.[28] At Lyon the Prêtres du Prado, under the direction of Monsignor Ancel, united physical labor with the priestly and apostolic life in a parish association and a priestly community—in 1955 there were 514 priests. "Right in the heart of the masses," according to the rule of Father Voillaume, the Petits Frères de Jésus sought to unite existence in the world through manual labor and contemplation in the religious community.[29]

---

[25] A Dansette, Destin du catholicisme français, 145–49, 247–61, 300–305.

[26] Ibid., 292. P. Montlucard and his movement Jeunesse de l'Église formed for a while the intellectual center of the worker priests and declared that the reform of society was the essential presupposition for the evangelization of the proletariat. Whether they played a decisive role in this development of the experiences among the worker priests is an open question.

[27] Ibid., 342–47.

These exertions of various types showed that the hopes placed in the specially oriented movements had not been fulfilled. These movements, as, for example, the JOC, had been able to train an elite of persons who had been loyal to their function to the point of heroism but who did not succeed in dealing with the difficulties of the milieu of the moment and the class-struggle mentality. In 1956 a crisis became visible between the ACJF, which claimed the entire religious schooling of all five movements (JOC, JEC, JAC, JIC, and JMC), and the JOC, which sought autonomy in this area.[30] The resignation of its president led in practice to the dissolution of the old ACJF. The JAC, on the contrary, was less dependent on its social milieu. Hence it did not suffer as much as the JOC during the crisis of 1956 and was able to maintain its membership and strength of personality in agriculture (Rémond, 655f.).

One can regard these movements which caused shocks in the French Church as signs of its vitality. The numbers of vocations to the priesthood and the religious life also testify to vitality in the postwar period. Of course, some other numbers could at first glance produce the impression of a catastrophe: Of 35,000 parishes, in which in 1880 one priest took care of the Church's ministry, in 1930 10,000 no longer had a resident priest. But these bare figures are deceptive, for they contain parishes with 300 and fewer inhabitants, who lost the priest who had been assigned to them in the nineteenth century. In reality, the number of diocesan priests, which amounted to 54,800 in 1913, had dropped to 46,980 in 1929 and to 42,486 in 1948.[31] If these figures are compared with those of the French population, then one arrives at the ratio of one active diocesan priest to 832 inhabitants in 1913, to 960 in 1929, and to 1,029 in 1950.[32] Perhaps characteristic of the religious condition of the nation is what Boulart terms the ordinations quota, that is, the number of young priests ordained for every 10,000 young men twenty-five to twenty-nine years old. This quota, which for 1902 amounted to fifty-two, fell to thirty between 1909 and 1913. It rose only very slowly on the eve of the war of 1914 and only experienced a noticeable diminution between 1934 and 1938, when it dropped to somewhat above forty. The interruption because of war and imprisonment caused this figure to rise to fifty for 1946–47, but from 1947 to 1949 it fell again to forty. If ordinations are compared on an average of every ten years, then there were 1,535 for the decade 1899–1908, 800 for 1919–28, and 1,088 for 1929–38.[33]

---

[28] Ibid., 311–13.

[29] Ibid., 214–17.

[30] Ibid., 399f.; F. Boulard, Essor ou déclin du clergé français? 132 and 164.

[31] R. Rémond, Histoire du Catholicisme, 655f.

[32] A. Dansette, Histoire religieuse, 632.

Apostolic activity is dependent on the occupation of young priests together with older priests, many of whom have passed the age of sixty. In 1946 an inquiry yielded 41,573 diocesan and religious priests in the active care of souls, of whom 28,777 were active in parishes and 7,166 in education.[34]

Neither in this present period nor in earlier times can the depth and quality of the Christianity of people be estimated by seeking to penetrate to its innermost being. One can at most, with the aid of the methods of investigation which Gabriel Le Bras so highly praised, provide a sort of chartlike survey of religious practice. Such a chart distributes the French population in almost equal parts into regions with Christian parishes, in which 45 percent take part in Sunday Mass and receive Easter Communion, and into such regions in which the number of practicing Catholics falls below 45 percent and which can be designated as "areas indifferent to Christian traditions." Outside these two larger groups there are still zones not to be overlooked in size, which belong to several sections, and those which are to be reckoned among the great urban masses of the population, in regard to which they constitute zones for mission work.[35]

---

[33] F. Boulard, "Les vocations sacerdotales en France. Le bilan d'un demi-siècle," NRTh 72 (1950), 486.

[34] F. Boulard, Essor ou déclin, 109. For the last decade the following figures result:

1965	646	1969	345	1973	219
1966	566	1970	285	1974	170
1967	489	1971	237	1975	161
1968	461	1972	193

[35] G. Le Bras, "Description de la France catholique," NRTh 70 (1948), 835, 845; map, pp. 840f. The author distinguishes three zones of Christian parishes: In the west the province of Brittany, the départements of Manche, Mayenne, parts of Maine-et-Loire, also Deux-Sèvres, and the forest area of La Vendée form a broad sector; a still wider sector is formed by Alsace, Lorraine, and Franche-Comté; a third block in the center

Even if France was not a Christian country in its entirety on the eve of the Second World War, still it presented the picture of a nation in which the Catholic Church possessed solid positions: a very thick network of rural parishes, a network of urban parishes and religious institutions at least in accord with the demands of the hour, an educational group active especially in the field of elementary schooling, and finally a prudent intellectual elite. The contrasts, like the gains from the beginning of the century, to some degree compensate, so that the Church of France seemed to be in a favorable starting position to regain the terrain lost in a century. It will be the task of the historians in the next centuries to investigate the reasons which led to the development in the most recent period and to the postconciliar crisis.

---

includes three départements and parts of three others. Add three regions of lesser extent, which show a high population density: in the départements of Nord and Pas-de-Calais, in some Alpine cantons, and a third nodal point at the foot of the Pyrenees. Another group is formed by the so-called "indifferent to Christian traditions" group. Here the author distinguishes a broad strip which runs through all of France from the north to the southeast and to which belong twenty entire départements, nine others almost in their entirety, and ten more in great part; next to this group must be placed a bloc which in the south of the Massif Central embraces two whole départements, seven others almost entirely, and two more in great part. In these two last-named blocs are found about twenty cantons with regularly practicing Catholics; but they are interspersed with missionary areas, in Yonne to two-thirds, in Aube to one-half, on the east edge of Loiret and in Creuse, Haute-Vienne, and Corréze. These third zones of mission territory are covered with districts of the great urban mass population, in which the proportion of nonbaptized children reaches 20 percent.

CHAPTER 22

*The Church in Spain and Portugal

Spain

In 1914 there were sixty-one dioceses, including the two now independent vicariates of Fernando Póo and Morocco, and nine archiepiscopal sees, which have today increased to eleven. In contrast to the 34,000 priests at that time, in 1972 there were 24,000. The male religious amounted to ca. 11,000 in 1925, to ca. 31,000 in 1972. In 1925 there were 35,000 sisters, in 1965 91,000.

* Spain: Quintín Aldea Vaquero; Portugal: Antonio da Silva.

The history of the Spanish Church in the last decades is divided into three parts: the Monarchy of Alphonso XIII (1914–31), the Second Spanish Republic and the Spanish Civil War (1931–39), and the postwar period after 1939.

THE MONARCHY OF ALPHONSO XIII (1914–31)

The year 1914 did not play as decisive a role in the history of Spain as it did in the other European countries. But it produced a great shock, which operated like an avalanche in the course of the disquieting years of the twentieth century. The concern of contemporary Catholics was concentrated on a series of neuralgic points: the hotly discussed problem of the two Spains—the traditional and Catholic Spain and the liberal and reforming Spain—the tensions between religion and politics as concomitant symptoms of the liberalism of the nineteenth century, the question of education, the social problem, and so forth. All of them crossed the path of the Spanish Church. There is no intention of dwelling unduly on this matter and treating the problems thoroughly, but something must be said on a few points in order to sketch the features of Spanish Catholicism.

The Problem of the Two Spains

This theme represents the background of all other problems, and contains a concept of the national life by means of definite guidelines and principles. What is the historical background of Spain? What is its destiny as a nation? On the answer to these questions depends the idea of the present history of Spain and with it the function which the Church must exercise in it. The basic answers which have been given to solve the historical riddle of Spain and which constitute the origin of the problem of the so-called two Spains[1] goes thus: "Progressivism and traditionalism are the true and decisive comrades-in-arms of our twentieth century from the Cortes of Cádiz to the Restauración de Sagunto," so says, quite rightly, Laín Entralgo.[2] After the restoration of 1874 the two opposed tendencies basically remained, with the natural change of reforms and renewals the two chief representatives of the Spanish drama. This situation prevailed with more or less serious incidents until 1936. On both sides were logically outstanding representatives. In the first third of the twentieth century there prevailed the prototype of the Catholic wing, Marcelino Menéndez Pelayo (1856–1912), even after his death, like El Cid in the saga, an incomparable master, who united in his person and in his gigantic work all works of Spanish culture. As no other, he raised a song of praise to the Catholic

[1] C. Sánchez Albornoz, Espãna, un enigma histórico II (Buenos Aires 1971), 670.
[2] P. Laín Entralgo, Espãna como problema (Madrid 1949), 14f.

unity of Spain in the epilogue of his Historia de los Heterodoxos Españoles: " . . . Spain, preacher of the gospel in half the world; Spain, terror of heretics, light of Trent, sword of Rome, cradle of Saint Ignatius . . . ; this is our greatness and unity: we have no other."[3]

On this line lay the declarations of the Popes and of the Spanish episcopate in their encyclicals, briefs, speeches, or pastoral letters respecting the glorious traditions of the nation. This tradition was constantly the background and determined the manner of speaking of the Church's officials; national greatness and Catholic tradition were one.

Facing this traditionalist position of Catholic Spain stood the other Spain, which we find incarnate in one of the greatest representatives of modern Spanish thought: José Ortega y Gasset (1883–1955). On 23 March 1914 he said on the occasion of a lecture delivered by him in the Teatro de la Comedia at Madrid: "We are sure that a great number of Spaniards agree with us that the destiny of Spain is intimately connected with the progress of liberalism."[4] In this connection he explained what he understood by liberalism: "that radical stimulation, always vital in history, which tries to exclude from the state every influence of extrahuman nature and which always expects from the new social measures a better result than from the old and traditional."[5] Hence, an end to the influence of the Church, because it is subject to human influence, and an end to the old traditions. In still more definite words he confronted tradition and consolidated his ideas in his work on tradition, Meditaciones del Quijote, which appeared in 1914: "The traditional reality in Spain has consisted precisely in this, permanently to destroy the opportunities of Spain. No, we cannot follow tradition . . . just the opposite is commanded: We must proceed against tradition, beyond tradition."[6] For Ortega y Gasset the Church was a permeating leaven. "Without doubt the Church is antisocial, religion is exclusive."[7] In the same way he thought of religious education: "The denominational school is, in comparison with the nondenominational, the beginning of anarchy, because it represents a singular pedagogy."[8] For him regeneration, that is, renewal, would bring Spain real political health, synonymous with Europeanization. "Spain was the problem, and Europe the solution."[9] In this way European Spain should lift itself above the traditional, that is, the unholy, unchurchly Spain. Around these two Spains were assembled and organized the Spaniards, intellectuals, workers, and peasants. The life of the Church unfolded by constraint within this sociological environment which influenced all its national and international activities.

---

[3] M. Menéndez Pelayo, Historia de los heterodoxos españoles VI (Santander 1948), 508.

[4] J. Ortega y Gasset, Obras completas I (Madrid 1957), 303.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid., 362f.

[7] Ibid., 519.

[8] Ibid.

Christian Syndicalism

In his lecture at the Teatro de la Comedia in 1914 Ortega y Gasset declared that the two current modern tendencies in Spanish public life were the Socialist Party and the trade-union movements.[10] Without intending to oppose this thesis, it is clear that the union movement and with it the so-called Social Question had won powerful importance in national events. What measures did the Spanish Church take, once it was faced with this serious problem?

Some historians and sociologists have sought, from the viewpoint of the second half of the twentieth century, to play down the countless initiatives which proceeded from the Church to render this problem harmless. The Church could be charged with neither passivity nor ignorance. Despite great difficulties, which had to be mastered, it laid for itself a road through the shaken social world. After the death of the Jesuit Antonio Vicent (1837–1912), "the patriarch of Spanish social Catholicism," as his famous pupil Severino Aznar called him, the Christian union movement began to gain in strength and extent. The ideal solution would have been at this moment the formation of workers' or peasants' unions without group ideologies. But considering the fact that the union acted in an antireligious manner and firmly attacked the Church, there was nothing else left except to organize the Christian union; in regard to this there occurred within the Catholic ranks a strong polemic, which partly absorbed the energies of the Catholic union. Nevertheless, successes could be attained among the peasant unions, since the rural population adhered to the Church more than did the industrial workers. Hence it is incorrect to speak of a failure of Christian unions[11]

The Church unions, regardless of whether they were denominationally oriented or not, had to follow the Church's guidelines; hence they could not offer the worker the revolutionary stimulus of the Unión General de Trabajadores (UGT) or of the Confederación Nacional del

---

[9] Ibid., 521.

[10] Ibid., 277.

[11] J. N. García Nieto, El sindicalismo cristiano en España (Bilbao 1960); D. Benavides, El fracaso social del catolicismo español o Arboleya Martínez, 1870–1951 (Barcelona 1973).

Trabajo (CNT), otherwise they would stand outside the Church's social doctrine and would not have been ecclesiastical unions. Gil Robles, one of the best politicians of that time, testified to a great momentum in the Confederación Nacional Católica Agraria. It was one of the organizations with which people would have to reckon.

SECOND SPANISH REPUBLIC AND CIVIL WAR (1931–39)

In an effort to end the social-political confusion which externally impaired Spanish life in the first third of the twentieth century, three political solutions were tried in succession: a concrete application of parliamentary government by Antonio Maura; the dictatorship of General Primo de Rivera, established on 13 September 1923; the Second Republic of 1931.[12]

The first two efforts were unsuccessful. The result of the communal elections of 12 April 1931, which had favored the monarchy numerically, produced the abdication of Alphonso XIII and the proclamation of the republic on 14 April. Seen from the religious standpoint, this meant the official establishment of anticlericalism in Spain, which within six years drove the Spanish Church into a frightful catastrophe without comparison in the history of the Church. The burning of monasteries and churches on 11 May 1931 and the expulsion of the bishop of Vitoria and of the primate of Toledo from Spain were clear indications of the religious attitude of the most powerful agents of the new Spanish policy. The spirit of the constitution of the republic was stamped by sectarismo to such a degree that even the president of the republic, Niceto Alcalá Zamora, conceded that those measures were an invitation to civil war.[13] Concerning ARTICLE 26 of the constitution, which dealt with the religious orders, Jóse Mariá Gil Robles, minister of that republic, says in his Memorias: "The enacting of ARTICLE 26 of the basic law was not only a remarkable injustice but represented a mistake with incalculable consequences. The religious problem was changed into a state of war with the danger of conflict between the two Spains."[14] Nevertheless, the ecclesiastical dignitaries recommended to the Spanish Catholics "respect and obedience to the lawful authorities and cooperation in all those matters whose aim was the general welfare and social peace."[15]

---

[12] J. Vicens Vives, Aproximación a la historia de España (Barcelona 1960), 215–18.

[13] A. Montero, Historia de la persecución religiosa en España 1936–1939 (Madrid 1961), 29.

[14] V. Palacio Atard, "Iglesia y Estado. La Segunda República Española (1931–1939)," Diccionario de Historia Eclesiástica de España II (Madrid 1972), 1181.

[15] "Exposición del Cardenal Primado al Presidente del Gobierno provisional, el 3 de junio 1931," A. Montero, op. cit., 29.

Even the members of the cabinet were surprised by the respect shown by the Church toward the republic. But they still did not feel induced to change their damaging attitude; on the contrary, the antireligious legislation went further. On 24 January 1932 a law was passed whose content was the abolition of the Society of Jesus; it had to seek its salvation in exile. The justification of the law was that the Jesuits paid obedience to a foreign power, the Pope. Some days later the divorce law was enacted; immediately thereafter there appeared in the Gaceta a decree on the secularization of cemeteries. Another decree prescribed that the cross be removed from the schools. All these measures injured in the keenest way the sensitivities of the overwhelmingly Christian families. In the face of this more or less open persecution nothing else was left to the Church than to issue a sharp protest. At first, on 25 May 1933, the Spanish episcopate published a "Declaración sobre la ley de Confesiones religiosas."[16] A few days later, on 3 June, appeared Pius XI's encyclical Dilectissima nobis, in which he lamented the situation in Spain.[17]

A clear example of the anticlerical extremism of the left was the uprising in Asturias in October 1934, in which an effort was made to set up a dictatorship of the proletariat. Fortunately, the revolt lasted only a few days. But this was long enough cruelly to murder thirty-four clerics, including minor seminarians, and to burn or desecrate fifty-eight churches. This was the program of action envisaged by the Marxist revolution for all of Spain. If this side had gained the victory, then this frightful martyrdom would have extended throughout Spain. In this situation the question of Antonio Montero was justified: "Is it necessary to point out that on the edge of the actual civil war and before it erupted, the program of the persecution of the Church was prepared to the last detail?"[18]

THE CIVIL WAR (1936–39)

Out of the elections of 16 February 1936 there emerged as victor, with the aid of the prevailing election system, which provided a bonus for the majority, the Popular Front, that is, a union of all the leftist parties. This victory was fostered by the votes of the members of the CNT and the split of the right parties. The new government tried unsuccessfully to satisfy its electors. Then political disintegration overtook the broad public. The leader of the national bloc, José Calvo Sotelo, drew in the parliament a sad balance of the events within the Popular Front government of six weeks from 16 February to 2 April 1936: there occurred 199 attacks and burglaries, 36 of them on churches; 178 fires were counted, including 106 churches burned down and 56 destroyed; 74 dead and 345 wounded were to be lamented. A few months later Calvo Sotelo himself was murdered in the night of 13 July 1936 by Popular Front police. This deed was declared an expressly political crime and sharply condemned by the sensible population of the country. It occasioned the Movimiento; the only way out was civil war. The army and the right joined in the struggle against the Marxist revolution. The Movimiento Nacional rose on 18 July; the two Spains were divided into two battlefields: the Red and the National Zones.

---

[16] A. Montero, op. cit., Apéndice Documental, 655.

[17] Ibid., 675.

[18] Ibid., 52.

The Red Zone

The Church did not take part in the Alzamiento. But through the bishop of Gerona, Dr. Castañá, it proclaimed "the gratitude that an innocent victim feels for its generous defender."[19] One year after the outbreak of war the Spanish bishops on 1 July 1937 addressed all the Catholic bishops of the world. In their letter they expressed in their concern for religion, home, and humanity not an empty thesis but "the events which characterize our war and give it its special features." Spain was divided in two: on the one side the Communist revolution with its barbaric, antireligious, and anti-Spanish licentiousness, on the other side the National Movement with its respect for the religious and national order. In this situation the Church, always remaining within its pastoral sphere and without pawning its spiritual freedom, had no other way out than to place itself on that side which "took the field for the defense of order, social peace, traditional civilization and homeland, and not least the defense of religion."[20] The tone of the episcopal letter was moderate, of emotional balance and realistic attitude. Only two bishops did not sign it: the archbishop of Tarragona, Francisco Cardinal Vidal y Barraquer, and the bishop of Vitoria, Mateo Múgica. The former, because he believed secret written information to the bishops of the various nations would be more effective and joined with less danger of reprisal against those who still lived in the Red Zone than a public common letter; the latter, because he was outside his diocese. The rest of the episcopate, forty-three bishops and five vicars general, signed it.

---

[19] A. Pérez Balaguer, Enciclopedia Universal Ilustrada. Suplemento anual 1936–1939 (Madrid 1944), 1551. Monsignor José Cartañá was a Catalan; his nomination as bishop occurred during the republic (29 December 1933) and hence did not depend on the right of presentation.

[20] A. Granados, El Cardenal Gomá, Primado de España (Madrid 1969), 348; L. Aguirre, La Iglesia y la Guerra española (Madrid 1964) (all on the common letter); C. Bayle, El mundo católica y la "Carta colectiva del episcopado español" (Burgos 1938).

The echo of the common letter was loud. "All members of the episcopate [ca. 900 bishops] replied by recognizing the legitimacy of the war on the part of national Spain and its character as a crusade for the Christian religion and civilization," said the future Cardinal Pla y Deniel.[21]

Meanwhile the real confrontation was carried out on the battlefield and beyond the fronts. It demanded of the Spanish Church a heavy tribute of blood and glorious martyrdoms. Twelve bishops of the dioceses of Sigüenza, Lérida, Cuenca, Barbastro, Segorbe, Jaén, Ciudad Real, Almería, Guadix, Barcelona, Teruel, and the auxiliary bishop of Tarragona died as martyrs. True to their evangelical task and with full knowledge of the danger to which they were exposed on the outbreak of war, they still remained at their posts. "I cannot leave out of fear; here is my duty, cost what it may," said the bishop of Cuenca to those who recommended flight. And for this reason the other shepherds remained with their flocks. All fell, sooner or later, with bodies riddled by bullets.

Because of their office, 4,184 priests had to die; they were hunted like game. Some dioceses suffered very heavy losses, as, for example, that of Barbastro; there 123 of the 140 pastors died, at Lérida 270 out of 410, and at Toledo 286 out of 600. Of the religious 2,365 died, some of them between seventeen and eighteen years old. Worst hit were the following institutes: Claretians with 259 dead, Franciscans with 226 dead, Piarists with 204 dead, Marists with 176 dead, Brothers of the Christian Schools with 165 dead, Augustinians with 155 dead, Dominicans with 132 dead, and Jesuits with 114 dead. The number of murdered sisters amounted to 283; even as women they were not spared persecution and torment. Altogether 6,832 priests, sisters, and brothers sacrificed their lives for the faith: an unmistakable proof of the vitality of the Spanish Church. As regards the type of martyrdom, no method known in history was overlooked: mutilation, death by fire, or even crucifixion.

The National Zone

At the outbreak of the Movimiento a religious movement was to be noted among the Spanish people and the warriors. There was a genuine rebirth of the religious life in the entire country. Victories at the front were celebrated with Masses, Te Deums, and Salve Reginas. The new government began to draw up new laws with a Christian meaning. The cross was again hung in the schools, and religious instruction was again introduced. Important laws, such as the Carta Magna del Fuero del

---

[21] A. Granados, op. cit., 178.

Trabajo of 1936 for the support of families, were oriented to the Church's social teaching. Great amounts of money were made available for the reconstruction of more than 20,000 destroyed churches. The corps of chaplains was reintroduced. All churches and chapels, the residences of bishops and priests with their grounds, and seminaries and monasteries were exempted from the land tax. In May 1938 the Society of Jesus was again permitted, with restoration of all rights and goods it had enjoyed before its dissolution. On 2 February 1939 the juridical status of all religious orders was restored. The republican legislation on divorce and civil marriage, the secularizaton of cemeteries, and the limitations on Catholic burials were repealed. In short, all those rights were again recognized in the Church which were contained in canon law. Respect for the Church and its institutions was again holy and removed from any discussion.

The chaplains at the front wrote a glorious chapter for the history of the Spanish Church. Among those who perished must especially be named the Jesuit Fernando Huidobro, favorite pupil of Martin Heidegger; the process for his beatification has begun.

SPAIN IN THE POSTWAR PERIOD (SINCE 1939)

The thirty years between 1939 and 1970 can be divided into two parts, of fifteen years each, which were marked by two different sorts of generation: a traditional generation (1939–55) and a critical generation (after 1955). The two groups are the same in exterior structure but different in dynamism.

The Twofold Trend

TRADITIONAL GENERATION. The religious organization in the Spain of the postwar epoch had its origin in the glorious Catholic tradition that was the ideal of the Spain which had once gained victory on the fields of battle. Hence one can speak of an amazing revival of the content of this tradition. Of this there were the following signs: strengthening of Church authority and respect for Church offices; increase of ecclesiastical vocations; improvement of ecclesiastical institutions and refounding of institutions; the wide extension of charitable activities, as, for example, the missions; spiritual exercises and religious courses; jubilee years with pilgrimages to Santiago de Compostela and Holy Week processions; attendance at Sunday Mass and reception of Easter Communion; the strong movement of the lay apostolate with Catholic Action, the Marian congregations, and other institutions. Religious books obtained a dominant position on the national book market. Religious publishers, such as El Mensajero, Sal Terrae, El Apostolado de la Prensa, la Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos, spread the works of the great authors throughout the world. The climax of this period was the concordat of 1953 as the embodiment of the classical principles of the canon law then in force and of the traditional spirit of Catholic Spain.[22] It would take us too far afield to evaluate all phenomena. The influence of the Spanish Church on Spanish society was enormous. Probably until then the Spanish Church never had so many possibilities of forming a society by means of Christian ideals. In 1940 the Church had charge of 60 percent of all high schools and hence could exercise its influence on youth in so critical a period of life; in 1955 it was still 42 percent.[23] Furthermore, the Church gave religious instruction in public schools and universities and was able to exercise influence in this way also. As regards the piety of the population, there can be noted, as an example only, that the missionary group of the Jesuit province of León alone could organize 2,118 missions in Spain betwen 1940 and 1965, among them some in large cities with up to 60,000 participating in one mission.[24]

CRITICAL GENERATION. In the course of the years the number of members of a small group of Catholics with an outlook directed to Europe and the world grew. This movement let itself be guided by the political philosophy of Jacques Maritain in questions of relations between Church and state. It also caused the introduction of liturgical forms from beyond the Pyrenees and the dissemination of foreign points of view and unfamiliar morals in Spain. The more these trends gained in importance, the certainty was strengthened that the block of classical Spanish thought began to crumble and that the traditional concept of Spanish life incurred the danger of losing its vigor. The polemic on the theme, carried out on the national and international level, had reached its highest intensity when the Second Vatican Council began. Some of the most important, hitherto disputed points of the notion of Christian life were raised by it to postulates. This fact produced a deep crisis on several levels of Spanish Catholicism, which to this day has not been removed.

Institutions

As outstanding representatives of the institutions within Spanish Catholicism must be mentioned: the episcopal conference, some institutes, Catholic Action, and the National Catholic Association of Propagandists.

---

[22] A. Martín Artajo, "El Concordato de 1953," Diccionario de Historia Eclesiástica de España I (Madrid 1972), 595–99. The author of this article was foreign minister at the time of the ratification of the concordat.

[23] La educación en España, Survey S.I. (private archives).

[24] Archivo de la Prefectura de Misiones Populares de la Provincia de León, S.I.

EPISCOPAL CONFERENCE. Since its establishment after the Second Vatican Council, the episcopal conference took over the control and administration which were previously cared for by the conferences of metropolitans. The decisions of the conference theoretically have no binding force for each diocese, but they are observed as if they were obligatory. In general, today the Spanish Church reacts on the collegial plane in all common questions. What is there discussed and decided is therefore of great general importance. The guidelines issued by the episcopal conference are in practice observed in the entire country. One of the most important stands of the episcopal conference was the declaration of January 1973 on "The Church and the political community," which was passed by a vote of fifty-nine for and twenty against, a situation in which is reflected the sociological structure of the episcopal conference. In this declaration the most important themes were treated which concerned the relations of Church and society, of Church and public order, the relations between Church and state with regard for the Catholic religion as the state religion, the revision of the concordat of 1953, and the renunciation of privileges and of the paying of ecclesiastics.

RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES. The improvement of the traditional institutes already in existence and the founding of new institutes are consequences of the religious revival of the postwar period. Altogether there are, according to the 1973 statistics, ca. 80 institutes of men with 24,281 members, apart from the 6,700 members who work outside Spain, especially in Latin America. As regards membership they are divided as follows: Jesuits 3,431; Salesians 2,535; Franciscans 2,174; Brothers of the Christian Schools 2,012; Dominicans 1,636; Piarists 1,303. These institutes displayed a great activity in schools and the press. Outstanding among the lay institutes is the Sociedad Sacerdotal de la Santa Cruz, or, for short, Opus Dei, founded at Madrid in 1928 by Monsignor José María Escrivá and recognized as an institute in 1947. According to statistics there were in 1966 in Spain 242 active institutes of women with 72,301 sisters, and 29 contemplative institutes with 19,211 sisters. The apostolic activity of these sisters is directed chiefly to schools: in 1967 56.12 percent were active in schools, while 20.28 percent performed their ministry in the health fields.

CATHOLIC ACTION. In 1926 Spanish Catholic Action was subjected to a profound restructuring. Previously it had been rather a loose union of the personnel present as a central organization; all Catholic personnel retained their own autonomy. After 1939 a strict centralization of all activities of the lay apostolate was introduced; it led to confrontations among the current personnel and partly impaired their work. From 1945 special institutions appeared with the founding of Juventud Obrera Católica (JOC) and Hermandad Obrera de Acción Católica (HOAC). On 5 December 1959 the conference of the Spanish metropolitans issued the new "Statute of Catholic Action," which consolidated the already existing central unity. This statute was replaced by a new statute issued on 1 February 1968 by the episcopal conference.

ASOCIACIÓN CATÓLICA NACIONAL DE PROPAGANDISTAS. Among the Catholic lay groups that exercise great influence on Spanish public opinion must be mentioned the Asociación Católica Nacional de Propagandistas. Founded at Madrid in 1908 by the Jesuit Ángel Ayala with the aim of preparing a group of the Catholic Men's Union of Saint Louis for Catholic propaganda, it had as president the future Cardinal Ángel Herrera Oria, who possessed an extraordinary gift for organizing. In 1911 it bought the Madrid newspaper El Debate and a year later Herrera founded El Editorial Católica as economic and ideological support of the paper. The union was concerned with all problems which preoccupied the Spanish Church in this century. After the war El Debate was stopped and in its place appeared Ya, which together with ABC are the two most important daily newspapers of the country. After the war La Editorial Católica began the publication of the series Biblioteco de Autores Cristianos, which today consists of more than three hundred volumes. The great activity of Catholic propaganda, without precedent in the history of the Spanish Church, achieved its climax in 1947 with the founding of the Centro de Estudios Universitarios (CEU); a division of the Centro is today the Colegio Universitario de San Pablo at Madrid with 5,000 students and eight faculties.[25]

Portugal

The development of Portuguese history in this century went through three phases: the anticlerical revolution of the bourgeoisie of 1910 (1910–26); the new regime (1926–60); and the era of the Second Vatican Council from 1960.

THE ANTICLERICAL REVOLUTION (1910–26)

After the overthrow of the monarchy by the republican forces, the latter proceeded against the Church. The bishops were sharply attacked because of their rejection of the divorce law of 20 April 1911 and in the course of 1912 driven from their dioceses, with one exception—the archbishop of Évora. Diplomatic relations with the Holy See were broken until 1918, and clerics were deprived of their property. The wearing of the cassock and the exercise of their activity as directors of committees named by the state in the sphere of the administration of the Church were forbidden to the clergy. Minor seminaries were closed by law, and of the major seminaries only five were spared from this measure, those of Braga, Pôrto, Coimbra, Lisbon, and Évora. A law of 22 February 1918 permitted the existence of two seminaries, but the confiscated buildings were not given back. Still, the seminaries at Angra in the Azores (1914), Viseu and Braga in the former Jesuit house (1915), Pôrto and Pôrto Alegre (1919), Guarda (1920), Lamego (1921), and Lisbon (1931) resumed their activity.

---

[25] J. L. Gutiérrez, "Asociación Católica Nacional de Propagandistas," Diccionario de Historia Eclesiástica de España I, 144–47.

By recourse to the laws of Pombal and those of the liberal regime of 1834 the members of 164 houses of thirty-one orders were expelled. But from 1917 on some congregations were reorganized. The revolution also forbade religious instruction in elementary and high schools and closed the theological and ecclesiastical faculty of Coimbra. Nevertheless, in the First World War there were again field chaplains.

The lay apostolate awoke as a reaction to these measures. Thus in 1913 occurred the reactivation of the Centro Acadêmico de Democracia Cristã (CADC), founded at Coimbra in 1903. At the same time was founded the Centro Católica, which from 1915 sent its representatives to the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, even though only a small number.

THE NEW REGIME (1926–60)

With the movement of General Gomes da Costa and the presidency of General Carmona begins a new order of authoritarian character, whose most important representative became Oliveira Salazar. This movement led in the area of the relations between Church and state to the concordat of 1940. The position of the Church improved; it included seventeen dioceses and three archdioceses.

The statistics of 1947 give a total of 4,500 priests, one priest for every 2,000 inhabitants. Seminaries were restored or newly built with occasional state aid.

The number of religious sisters and brothers grew considerably. The communities obtained a little financial help from the state in proportion to the number of active missionaries and students. Around 1947 there were in the country some 400 religious priests and in 1952 ca. 4,400 sisters.

Religious instruction was reintroduced in the elementary and high schools. The number of schools with religious direction, especially schools for girls, increased, although they were attended mostly by the rich segment of the population and although there was no state aid. The education in these schools was primarily humanistically oriented and scarcely scientifically. Around 1930 a university institute for social assistance was founded at Lisbon. Jesuits taught in the philosophical university institute, run exclusively by them, which in 1947 was recognized as an ecclesiastical faculty.

In the field of journalism the following deserve mention: Estudos of the CADC of Coimbra (since 1922), Brotéria (since 1925), Lumen (for the clergy since 1930), Portugal em África (since 1944), Revista Portuguesa de Filosofia and Itinerarium (both since 1945). Among the most important institutions for social communication are the newspaper Novidades and the Catholic Broadcasting Radio Renascença, which was silenced by the revolutionary forces in 1975 and was later given back by the government.

The number of traditions in worship was increased by the great crowds on pilgrimage to the national shrine of Fatima since 1931. In addition, catechesis and liturgy again grew in importance, especially due to the exertions of the Lisbon seminary and the Benedictines. The lay apostolate began to take new routes. After the prohibition of political parties it withdrew from political life, to which so far the Centro Católico had devoted itself, and strengthened its collaboration with the church authorities. In 1932 the bishops founded the official Acção Católica, which in November 1933 obtained a juridical statute confirmed by Pope Pius XI. Portugal's missionary work produced in Angola up to 1940 as many as 500,000 Catholics with 174 missionaries, in Mozambique as many as 60,000 Catholics with 126 priests; but up to 1970 as many as 2.5 million in Angola and 1.25 million in Mozambique.

UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL (FROM 1960)

The Portuguese Church appeared at the council with only its bishops, hence without periti. In other words, it was a preponderantly traditional and authoritarian Church. In 1968 it numbered 4,500 diocesan and 900 religious priests; hence there was a slight increase in comparison to 1947, but this was also caused by the growth of the population, everything else being equal. These relations also remained constant in regard to the rural or urban origin of vocations.

At this time there were 18 major seminaries and 22 minor seminaries; the latter had 2,800 pupils in 1952 and 900 in 1968. The major seminaries had 4,049 students in 1952; by 1968 they decreased to 3,977. The general crisis in the seminaries extended also to the orders.

By 1960 the Acção Católica achieved its zenith. In this regard the national meetings of the Juventude Católica Universitária from 1953 to 1963 represented the climax. Among the ranks of the lay apostolate movements were to be observed which tended to achieve a greater independence in regard to the episcopate. By 1960 the statistics list the number of 95,000 members of Acção Católica, that is, 1.2 percent of the population. In the field of the university apostolate the founding of the Catholic University at Lisbon and of two other universities must not be forgotten. Still, the realities did not correspond to the structures. In the confrontation of the Church with the revolution of 1974 it was revealed that the former was poor, apolitical, without organized youth, with seminaries overtaken by crisis, and without adequate personnel. The present difficulties in the country have produced a concentration of Catholic forces, which allow one to hope for new initiatives.

CHAPTER 23

*The Countries of the English-Speaking Area

Europe

GREAT BRITAIN

Population

The Catholic population of England and Wales in 1914 was estimated as 2,100,446, including 3,872 priests; in contrast there was a total population of 36,204,679 in 1911. There were 1,837 Catholic churches, chapels, and missions, of which 1,307 were authorized by civil law for marriages. At the same time there were 518,969 Catholics in Scotland, including 577 priests; they had 427 churches and chapels. When in 1966 the total population of England and Wales amounted to 48,075,000, the Catholic population had grown to 4,000,695, including 5,096 diocesan priests and 2,791 religious priests, with 3,446 public churches and chapels and 1,196 private devotional sites. In the intermediate time the Catholics had spread equally in the large cities and suburbs, but not in the rural areas; Catholicism remained an urban phenomenon. At the same time the number of Catholics in Scotland rose to 809,680 in a total population of 5,191,000.

* Robert Trisco

This growth was based partly on the natural increase of the population, on conversions, and on the immigration of refugees from the continent, especially Poles and Ukrainians, but chiefly on immigration from Ireland. In fact, about three-fourths of the Catholics in Great Britain were of Irish descent, insofar as they were not themselves born in Ireland. The heterogeneity proceeding from this was gradually broken down by the integration of the immigrants into British Catholicism. The annual number of adult converts—between 12,000 and 10,000—remained almost unchanged from 1925 to the Second World War, in spite of the growth of the total population. Many converts were the future or present husbands or wives of Catholics. Of the rest, more Catholics came from the middle class, who were better able to cope with the claims of the Church than the lower class, and in proportion there were more converts among the Nonconformists, whose organized religious life quickly dissolved, than among the Anglicans. Meanwhile, however, the Church suffered a constant "loss"; even a great part of the children who came from Catholic schools soon gave up their practice of religion. These factors prevented the percentage of Catholics in England from increasing notably. Partly as a consequence of the prejudices of their fellow citizens and partly because of their own cultural inferiority, the influence of the English Catholics in public life did not correspond to their numerical strength.

Organization

From 1911 there were in England and Wales three metropolitan sees—Westminster, Liverpool, Birmingham—and thirteen dioceses. In 1916 the archdiocese of Cardiff emerged from the diocese of Newport in Wales, with Menevia as its only suffragan see. New episcopal sees were erected in 1917 at Brentwood and in 1924 at Lancaster. In 1965 the diocese of Southwark was raised to metropolitan status, and at the same time its suffragan see of Arundel and Brighton was erected. There were then in England and Wales five provinces with five archdioceses and fourteen dioceses. In addition, in 1957 the archbishop of Westminster was named apostolic exarch for the Ukrainians of the Byzantine Rite, which numbered more than 20,000 adherents; in 1961 Augustine Eugene Hornyak, O.S.B.M., a Ukrainian priest, was made his auxiliary bishop, and six years later he himself became apostolic exarch for Great Britain.

In Scotland from 1878 the archdiocese of Saint Andrews and Edinburgh had existed as metropolitan see with four suffragans, and the archdiocese of Glasgow had belonged to no ecclesiastical province; in 1947 the last named became a metropolitan see with two suffragan sees, which were newly erected at Motherwell and Paisley.

Furthermore, the archbishop of Westminster represented the episcopate in discussions with the government. The following occupied this post: 1903–35, Francis Bourne, a cardinal in 1910; 1935–43 Arthur Hinsley, cardinal in 1937; 1943–56 Bernard Griffin, cardinal in 1946; 1956–63 William Godfrey, cardinal in 1958; 1963–75 John Heenan, cardinal in 1965; and since 1976 Basil Hume, O.S.B., cardinal in the same year.

From the reign of Elizabeth I Great Britain had no diplomatic relations with the Holy See, but after the outbreak of the First World War the government sent Sir Henry Howard to convey the congratulations of the King to the newly elected Pope Benedict XV and to explain to him the reason for the entry into the war. The British representative stayed in Rome as extraordinary ambassador and minister plenipotentiary "on special mission." In 1920 the legation was made a regular and permanent institution. But the relations were never brought to reciprocity. No nunciature was established in London; in fact not until 1938 was an apostolic delegation opened in the British capital. The first apostolic delegate was an Englishman, William Godfrey, who took care of this post until he became archbishop of Liverpool in 1953.

Educational System

In 1914 343,472 pupils were educated in 1,169 Catholic primary schools and 24,129 in 387 Catholic secondary schools. In conformity with the Education Act of 1902 denominational schools had to be erected and repaired by voluntary offerings, although the expenses of maintenance and the salaries of teachers were paid out of public funds. They were endangered by the inability of the faithful in an age of rising costs to care for adequate premises and equipment. Discussions conducted in a friendly atmosphere between representatives of the state and the Church produced the "Scottish solution." In accord with the Scotland Education Act of 1918, the directors of the already existing Church schools or those to be established in the future were authorized to sell their schools to the education authorities, to lease them, or to transfer them in other ways. But the education authorities could themselves also erect new denominational schools. The officials were from then on to exercise complete control over the schools, including the appointment and dismissal of teachers, but in this connection the teachers on hand were to retain their positions. In the future no teacher could be appointed before he or she had been accepted by the relevant denominational corporation, "in regard to religious faith and character."

An unpaid supervisor, who had likewise to be accepted by the denomination, was to be appointed for every school. The supervisor had the right of access to all classes which were specified for religious instruction and worship, and he had to report to the Church authorities on the effectiveness of the religious instruction that was given. (In Catholic schools this supervisor was normally the parish priest, and diocesan inspectors had permission to give examinations in religion.) Thus was ended the administrative dualism, as the local authorities desired it, but the religious dualism was retained, because the bishops insisted on it in order to preserve the Catholic character of their schools. In spite of their security precautions and the fact that this agreement was to a great extent the work of William Francis Brown, whom the Pope had named as apostolic visitor for Scotland the previous year, the Scottish bishops and the Catholics in general were frightened by it. Finally, the Holy See with its only intervention in educational questions directed them to accept the agreement. This regulation functioned smoothly from the beginning and in the course of time was regarded from the Catholic standpoint as one of the best arrangements in the entire world. The Scottish Catholics opened many free schools for the primary and secondary grades and several colleges operated by religious orders, and all were supported by local and national public financing. (A few private Catholic schools which raised instructional fees likewise continued in existence.)

The situation of the Catholics in England and Wales differed from that of the Scots in many respects and in 1918 the bishops could not agree to give up the rights of ownership of their schools. Between 1914 and 1930 the Catholics built ninety-six schools with 60,000 places at a capital expenditure of £1,700,000. Meanwhile, construction costs steadily mounted and many of the older schools had to be replaced or expanded, and, especially in the cities, new schools had to be erected. The burden became intolerable. In order to draw public attention to the injustice of their situation, the Catholics organized great protest gatherings and called upon the members of parliament to give assistance. After the founding of the Irish Free State in 1921, English Catholics no longer had many friends in parliament, and the Labour Party had many members who by tradition were hostile to Catholicism, although it depended, especially in certain areas, also on the votes of the Catholic English workers. In 1931 the Catholic Educational Council decided to carry out a campaign for the adoption of the Scottish system in England and Wales, but the prospects of achieving this goal became less as each year passed, partly because the National Teachers' Association did not want to accept any system that would have meant the introduction of denominational instruction in a much larger number of schools under state ownership and religious examinations for specific teachers.

In 1936 the Catholics were forced to accept aid under conditions that were quite other than favorable. The Education Law of this year authorized the local authorities to contribute 50 to 75 percent of the costs for the erecting of voluntary schools. These schools had become necessary by the express intention of the state to raise the age of leaving school to fifteen years on 1 September 1939 and to "reorganize" the educational system. In order to correspond to the demands of the Free Churches and of the National Association of Teachers, this regulation had to be severely limited in time: applications had to be filed within three years; only the furnishing of the high schools was provided, although there was a greater need for the reorganization of the elementary schools; the teachers in those schools which obtained building subsidies had to be appointed by the local school officials, if even a small part of them—on which the directors of the schools and the officials had to agree—had to be "reserved" teachers, that is, such as were chosen in discussion with the school administration and were qualified to impart the relevant denominational instruction. In all voluntary schools there had to be given, in the event the parents wished it, a nondenominational religious instruction in keeping with the teaching plan prescribed for the local public schools. Finally, the aid was only permitted, but not prescribed as an obligation. Because the Catholics, under the leadership of the new archbishop of Westminster, Arthur Hinsley, feared that the Catholic high schools would lose their students to the better equipped public schools if they were not reorganized, they decided to make use of the offer and at the same time to work to retain their elementary schools.

The effects of these legal measures were not entirely satisfactory, although because of them a good by-product resulted: the setting up of diocesan school commissions in places where previously there had been none. The reorganization in rural areas, which included the erection of central schools, was delayed by the difficulties growing out of the great distances and the need of means of transportation, and it threatened to divide the life of the parish congregations. In the cities the development proceeded faster. Many offices, including London, were ready to grant the full financial subsidy, 75 percent, conceded by the law; others gave 50 percent. The single ill-famed case as a contrary example was Liverpool. There the constant immigration of Irish had caused an acute overcrowding of the Catholic schools in the areas of the dockyards. Under the influence of the local conservatives, allied with the militant Protestants, the city council had refused to grant the aid for the erection of denominational schools. When the Catholics did not succeed in the local elections in getting revenge for this provocation, the state education office intervened and held back a part of the sum which the state treasury assigned annually to the Liverpool office. Finally a compromise was reached in 1939, when parliament adopted a special law for Liverpool, whereby the city council was empowered to build high schools and then lease them to the denominational corporations at rents between 25 and 50 percent of the costs of the loan.

When the Second World War broke out, only 44.8 percent of the Catholic school districts had been reorganized. Even in 1942 there were still no less than 399 dilapidated Catholic school buildings on the "Black List" of the education office—this list included schools with defective equipment. The continuation of the reorganization was prevented by the war, and the age of leaving school could not be raised at the intended time. Of the 289 Catholic applications, which were submitted in accord with the law of 1936, only the nine approved were implemented. Although there was only one English community without a Catholic school—Morley near Leeds—almost 20 percent of the Catholic children in the country were not in Catholic schools. Nevertheless, the 1,200 Catholic schools made up 12 percent of the voluntary schools and instructed 8 percent of the total population of obligatory school age.

When the government began with the planning of a coherent system in the sphere of the primary grades, the secondary grades, and the higher school system, the Catholics began an active campaign of organized opposition to this project—the Green Book of 1941—and emphatically demanded that in their schools the denominational character remain intact. The Catholic Parents' Associations, the first of which was founded in 1940 at Ilford in the diocese of Brentwood, were increased on the parish level and coordinated by diocesan councils, which for their part were represented in an interdiocesan Council of the Catholic Parents' and Electors' Association. Its chief concern consisted for several years in assuring and promoting Catholic interests in the educational system.

Before a law was introduced in parliament there were long discussions with the president of the Board of Education, R. A. Butler, and representatives of the Anglicans, the Catholics, the Free Churches, and the teachers. However, the Catholic speakers were isolated, for the Anglicans had acquiesced, and the Free Churches and the professional associations had the upper hand. Because the Catholics failed to obtain even the slightest concessions, they opposed the law until parliament had passed it. The result showed that people in England and Wales, who, differently from Scotland, were already strongly de-Christianized, could not appeal to an influential public opinion which was convinced that religion formed the heart of education; one could claim only "equality of opportunity," the right of parents to have their children educated in their own faith and at no greater cost than what their non-Catholic neighbor had to pay.

The Education Law of 1944, the "Butler Act," provided financial aid for three categories of denominational primary and secondary schools. In all these schools all costs for secular and religious education were to be defrayed from public sources, but the state retained the right to assure itself that the schools were needed and that new schools were erected only to the extent that the national finances permitted: (a) The "voluntary aided schools" should remain totally denominational. But the state was now ready to pay to the school administrators 50 percent for approved necessary repairs and improvements and up to 50 percent of the expenses for specific reconstructions. Normally the school administrators were helped by loans with favorable conditions, and auxiliary services—medical examinations, school meals—were paid for by the state. (b) The "special arrangement schools" were supported in accord with the provisions of the law of 1936; the applications filed within the prescribed time, which had not been approved or implemented, could now be revived with the necessary alterations in the previously determined conditions in regard to a limiting of the number of those teachers who were recognized because of their qualifications for imparting denominational instruction. Other regulations should be the same as for the first category. (c) "Controlled schools" were to be financed and supported exactly as if they were public schools, with the exception of some concessions, which were made as an accommodation for the cession of the buildings, for example, the right of the denominational officials to name one-third, instead of two-thirds, of the school administrators.

The Catholics completely rejected the "controlled" status. As a result, they faced the most difficult task of raising the funds needed for their "voluntary aided schools"—half the costs of modernizing, reconstruction in new places, and accommodation of "transferred" students—and also the means for their "special arrangement schools"—from one-fourth to one-half—and for new schools—the total costs of building sites and the buildings. The heaviest burden was for the Catholics, especially for male and female religious institutes, the secondary school system because of the higher age for obligatory schooling and because of the abolition of all fees in the state schools. The existing Catholic secondary schools for the most part accepted the status of elementary schools, and, except for those which were especially instituted for the higher classes, strove to be recognized by the education authorities as "effective" in their various categories. By 1948 the number of "recognized" schools had risen to 109, and the number of those which obtained state money to 73.

Two supplementary laws of 1946 and 1948 eased somewhat the burden laid on the Catholics, but the expenses mounted further. A pupil's place, which had cost ca. £60 in 1939, in 1949 required between £191 and £400, with variations from diocese to diocese. Meanwhile, the number of Catholic children who did not go to Catholic schools rose from one to four. In 1950 the hierarchy proposed some redress and set up an "Action Committee" to guide local deputations drawn from the parishes and lay organizations; they were to inculcate these proposals in the candidates for parliament during the general election of that year. Although the Catholic electors were informed of the positions of the candidates, this campaign did not succeed in obtaining noteworthy support from them, especially because no political party showed an inclination to take up this controversial matter.

Because the Catholics were not in a position to erect sufficient secondary schools, from 1956 they again made demands for state aid, but this time they did not have recourse to public agitation. Some 30 percent of the Catholic children of school age were at this time not in Catholic schools, although the Church had, between 1945 and 1959, raised the number of its schools by almost 25 percent, that is, by more than 300 schools, created 100,000 new school places, and projected a further 150,000. The education law of 1959 was accepted in part as answer to the demands of the Catholics and Anglicans. This law raised the aid due previously from 50 to 75 percent and granted subsidies of 75 percent for the erecting of new voluntary secondary schools, which were totally or very greatly necessary to take those children from the primary schools of the same denomination which had existed on 15 June 1959 or who came from such primary schools as had been erected to replace the schools existing at this same time. For the Catholics the limitation imposed by the date and the exclusion of aid for the building of primary schools was, of course, a disappointment.

In 1966 there were among the Catholic voluntary schools in England and Wales 1,801 primary schools and schools for all ages, with 441,358 pupils, 388 modern secondary schools, with 142,670 students, 62 classical secondary schools, with 29,520 students, and 39 secondary schools of other sorts, with 24,347 students; in addition, there were 56 schools with direct aid and 36,146 pupils, 557 independent schools with 114,964 pupils, and 42 special and approved schools with 3,404 pupils, hence altogether 2,945 Catholic schools with 792,389 students.

In view of these numbers the Catholics again presented their requests and demanded 85 percent of all building costs. Finally they were satisfied with the provisions of the education law of 1967, which was introduced by the Labour Government and accepted by parliament almost without opposition. The state raised not only the existing subsidies for all voluntary schools or those supported by special arrangement, so far as they were paid for approved repairs and improvements, to 80 percent, but it now also counted what was still more important, 80 percent for the erecting of entirely new schools or for the expansion of existing schools, even if such aid had previously not been granted to these. The government was able to concede these increased subsidies in part because the churches had established more harmony among themselves.

In order to be able to supply these schools with personnel, the existing teachers' training schools were improved and new ones were established. The erection of five new institutions for teacher training in the years after 1960 was the result of long discussions with the Ministry of Education and the Council of Catholic Education. In 1968 there were fourteen Catholic institutions for teacher training in England and Wales.

The attempt to found a Catholic university was not made in these years. However, in 1922 the University Catholic Federation of Great Britain had been founded to unite the Catholic associations at the English universities; it was attached to the Pax Romana, from which it had obtained the stimulus for its founding. It was reorganized in 1942, when the nongraduates founded the Union of Catholic Students and the graduates the Newman Association; the two organizations cooperated closely. The Union began with the publishing of a periodical and of an annual, in which in detail were presented the various methods by which it aspired to stress the Catholic influence in the life and works of the universities. The Newman Association attracted graduates from various professions and states of life; it set up a center in London and some active local branches. It also began the publishing of a monthly bulletin, Unitas, and displayed useful activities such as vacation courses, lecture series, and public university courses, some of which obtained recognition fom the University of London Extension Board.

Social Movement

The chief impulse for the social movement was the Catholic Social Guild. A group of priests and lay persons from the middle-class intellectuals had founded it in 1909 for the following ends: (1) to facilitate dialogue between Catholic students and workers; (2) for assistance in the achieving of applications of Catholic principles to actual social conditions; (3) to awaken in Catholic circles a greater interest in social questions and to assure their cooperation in the promotion of social reforms according to Catholic guidelines. With the encouragement of the hierarchy, this guild pursued these goals predominantly through study clubs or groups; in 1914 there were ninety-five such groups, with about one thousand members, which were concentrated in the north of England, and, in opposition to the expectations of the founders, consisted almost entirely of workers. Although adequately trained leaders were missing, the number of study clubs rose to 379 by 1938; during the war this number dropped, again rose to 337 in 1950, and decreased after that. Within the educational program for adults the guild introduced a correspondence course, for which it granted certificates and diplomas. In addition, it produced and disseminated literature which treated social questions; it planned and promoted instructional programs, some textbooks, and examinations for the various groups. From the middle of 1911 to 1920 the guild published a Quarterly Bulletin, from 1921 on the monthly The Christian Democrat and the Catholic Social Year Book; it published many timely penny brochures and the series of books, Catholic Studies in Social Reform, which were used by the study clubs as manuals. Especially influential were its publications on international law after World War I and on the union system and employee-employer relations. Under the guidance of the guild days of recollection for workers were held; in the first fifteen years after World War I more than 9,000 persons at Birmingham and elsewhere took part in these days of recollection. Finally, the guild trained lecturers and instituted lectures. In 1919 the headquarters of the administration was moved from London to Oxford. The number of members rose to 3,910 up to 1939, and, following a decline during the war, to 4,166 in 1948.

In 1920 the guild arranged the first summer vacation course lasting one week. Its aim was to bring different classes together, to awaken understanding between employers and employees, and to make Catholic social doctrine known in broader circles. The number of participants rose from year to year and peaked in 1948 with 230; after that it declined, and at the end of the 1950s the vacation courses were stopped.

In 1921 the guild founded the Catholic Workers' College at Oxford in order to educate men, and from 1923 women also, as leaders for their worker colleagues. This was a "monument" to Charles Plater (1875–1921), one of the founders of the guild. The first principal of the college was Father Leo O'Hea, S.J., who in 1924 became also the editor of the periodical The Christian Democrat and manager-secretary of the guild. The college instituted courses on political and economic theory and history, likewise on social ethics and moral philosophy, but also on special themes, such as unions, community administration, and international relations. In 1925 it was recognized by the Education Office because of its provisions for adult education and empowered by the university to grant diplomas. All students received stipends from the financial means which came from varied sources, and from 1926 they could also receive a stipend of the Education Office. Most students came from England, Scotland, and Wales, but in later years there were also a few from abroad. In the first twenty-six years of its existence the college trained only 146 students. Nevertheless, some of its graduates were active in community politics and in the union movement.

When interest in the study groups slackened, obviously because study was regarded as an end in itself instead of a means to an end, action groups were founded. Likewise in 1954 the guild called the action group service into being, which from week to week supplied a system and a plan for study. This change could not entirely transform the trend to inflexibility. A new "Program for Social Action," drafted chiefly by Michael P. Fogarty, was published in 1957 in the Catholic Social Year Book, but in consequence of differences of opinion which led the guild into a crisis in the late 1950s, it was not realized. Finally, lay persons obtained the leading position, after the offices of the manager-secretary in 1958 and of the principal of the College of Workers in 1962 had been filled by them; they were merely advised by a priest, whom the bishops had named as moderator.

In the course of the years the guild took a stand for definite concerns. After World War I it supported a guaranteed minimum wage and the family money plan. In 1926 it supported the general strike, until Cardinal Bourne condemned it. In the disturbed years after 1920 and 1930 the guild stood up for the unions and their rights. In its publications it explained the "corporate order" which Pius XI had recommended in Quadragesimo Anno. In the years after 1940 the guild found fault with the welfare state, but most Catholics gradually came to consider it with limited approval.

True, the Catholic Social Guild avoided detailed plans or programs and thereby was satisfied to promote a knowledge of general principles, which the individual Catholic could then apply to special situations; but some of its members from the very start favored a clearly articulated, concrete program that was based on a policy of social reform. Some of them, especially among the younger, devoted themselves to the doctrine of Distributism, which was represented by Hilaire Belloc, Gilbert Keith Chesterton, Eric Gill, and Father Vincent McNabb, O.P. The "Distributists" abhorred both industrial capitalism and socialism and recommended instead a wide distribution of property to private ownership. They presented their theory in numerous articles, which they published in The New Witness (1912–23), G.K.'s Weekly (1925–36), The Weekly Review (1936–47), The Defendant (1947–56), and finally The Distributist. The literary basis of the movement was strengthened by a social structure when in 1926 the Distributist League was founded in London. Within three months there arose affiliates in the large cities of England and Wales. At regular intervals the league organized public lectures and discussions on timely affairs; these events were attended by a relatively large number of auditors. But all their exertions led only to unimportant results, partly because of differences of opinion among the Distributists themselves. While a few called for action, Chesterton and his adherents were satisfied with propaganda—although, Chesterton and Belloc submitted proposals and recommended their implementation to the government. The members of the league were also not in agreement on the right to property and the use of machines; Father McNabb, an extremist, condemned them together with industrialism as a whole as an evil. Controversies of this sort left in the broad public the impression that they were utopian theoreticians and uncritical admirers of medieval civilization. The Birmingham Plan, proposed in 1928 by the affiliate in that city and later revised from time to time, was the most practicable, and The Distributist Program, which was published by the league in 1934, outlined the practical measures by which the ideal situation could be realized. But there were only a few persons willing to make the required renunciation of all those comforts and amenities which industrialization had contributed and again lead a simple handicraft life. Besides, other Catholics, especially members of the Catholic Social Guild, reviled the Distributists as unrealistic. From ca. 1939 every effective activity of the league ended, but individual Distributists continued in the years after 1950 their publications and proposals on their theory.

The recommendation of the Distributists for the gaining of the necessary livelihood by agriculture as a form of practical action was realized in the Back-to-the-Land Movement. In 1929 The Scottish Catholic Land Association was founded, and in 1931 and 1932 five regional Catholic agricultural societies were established in England. The six associations were represented by a standing joint committee, and Land for the People, begun by the Scots in 1930, was the common organ until 1934; in this year it returned to control by the Scots. At the same time the associations in England and Wales were reorganized as the Catholic Land Federation, which established a new official organ, The Cross and the Plough. Each local society had as its protector the local bishop or bishops, a priest as chairman, and a layman as secretary. According to Monsignor James Dey, chairman of the federation, the chief function of the associations consisted of establishing communities of small farmers with the secondary occupations united with them. In this way the natural right of man to private ownership would again be confirmed; unemployment would be mitigated, and Catholic life on the land would be renewed. Because the urbanized proletariat had first to be educated in agricultural methods, the societies instituted teaching farms, in which unmarried men should obtain a three-year teaching program in theory and practical instruction and also spiritual direction. However, these farms had only a brief life because of lack of money. For the same reason the societies could not set aside any land for settlement by independent farmers. The hierarchy entirely refused to approve and support a collection and thereby to give this movement official recognition, because it feared that this money would be diverted from the budget for the building of schools and churches in new localities, and because it doubted the financial practicability of the entire plan. Also the general indifference of the Catholics, doubts that the small holdings were a means against unemployment, and their distrust of the leading theoreticians in the movement, and also the lack of any support at all by the government—all this contributed to the dissolving of the associations and of the federation. However, The North of England Catholic Land Association, with corresponding subsidies from the government, until 1942 trained young men as farm workers—first for three months in a youth hostel or a home, then with a farmer—and The Cross and the Plough continued its issues until mid-1949.

During the great economic crisis, other Catholics, such as Father Paul Crane, S.J., John Fitzsimons, and other members of the Catholic Social Guild, saw in the work of Peter Maurin and Dorothy Day in the United States a model for action. In June 1935 they founded a new periodical, The Catholic Worker, whose first editor was John Ford. This newspaper was sold in all large cities on the streets, and the sellers formed discussion and action groups. In imitation of the American model they established Friendship Houses in some places. Among clergy and laity not everyone approved the aims of this movement, but The Catholic Worker continued until 1959. In that year its last editor, Robert P. Walsh, became organizational secretary of the Catholic Social Guild and editor of its monthly, The Christian Democrat.

Around 1935 The Christian Democrat had directed attention to the Jeunesse Ouvrière Chrétienne in Belgium and France, and, when the Young Christian Workers were officially founded in England in 1937, their directors were selected from a study group of the Catholic Social Guild, which consisted of sellers of the newspaper The Catholic Worker. Father Gerard Rimmer founded the first group, and one of its members was Patrick Keegan, the future president of the World Union of Christian Worker Movements. The movement of the Young Christian Workers spread quickly and reached a part of the population which the Catholic social movement had previously not affected, but before the outbreak of World War II their organization had still not acquired a solid basis. The YCW also began with the preparation of boys and girls, before they left school, and from this work emerged the Pre-YCW, which Keegan founded in 1949. Also in the postwar years former members of the YCW developed the Family Social Apostolate to put its religious principles into practice in married life.

The Catholic Social Guild, the Catholic Women's League, the Catholic Education Council, and other organizations appointed delegates to the Catholic Council for International Relations, which had been founded in 1924 as a sort of uniting committee. Its function was to establish unity of action among the Catholics of all nations in all matters which affected their faith and to foster the business of international peace. Its work was chiefly of the educational type and was carried out by public announcements and international conferences.

Between the two world wars there appeared still other organizations. A lay group, which had regularly visited the ships in the harbor of Glasgow, established the Apostleship of the Sea in 1920. In the following year the administrator of the archdiocese approved the temporary guidelines and statutes. In 1922 Archbishop Donald A. Mackintosh communicated the blessing and a letter of recognition from Pius XI and became the first president of the society. Its task was the spiritual care of seamen. The work soon spread in Great Britain and to other countries; in 1927 200 churches in numerous harbors of the world were designated as sailors' centers. The administrative headquarters was first transferred from Glasgow to London, and in 1952 Pius XII established the general secretariat at Rome.

While the beginnings of an organization of Catholic contractors had only slight success, the British Catholic workers belonged to the general unions and never tried to establish unions of their own. But they held an annual National Conference of Catholic Trade Unionists and later founded diocesan associations of Catholic unionists. Two former students of the Catholic Workers' College founded the first of these associations with the consent of the bishop of Hexham and Newcastle in 1942, after the Congress of Unions at Blackpool had declared its opposition to state aid for denominational schools. After the war the local associations were united in a national corporation. It aimed at the organization of the opposition to Communist intrigues in the unions and worked to make its members better Catholics and better unionists. In both respects it achieved remarkable successes, but in the years after 1950 the energy and influence of the Catholic unionists slackened.

The apparently most impressive movement which was started by Catholics during these years was the Sword of the Spirit, founded in 1940 by Cardinal Hinsley, an ardent patriot, who made a deep impression on the English people especially by his moving radio talks in the first years of World War II. It was the goal of this movement to assert the principles of Christianity and of the natural law against National Socialism and other totalitarian doctrines, for this end to support the national interest in the war, to seek for the postwar period a regulation and reorientation of Europe on the basis of such principles, and to unite all citizens for these goals. The activities of this movement were under the keywords "Prayer"—including sermons, retreats, days of recollection, and spiritual reading—"Study"—including lectures and discussion groups, for whose leadership plans were handed down—and "Action," which should be undertaken not in the name of the movement itself but through individuals and groups, who acted according to its principles. The original stimulus to this movement came from Christopher Dawson, who was first named lay leader and later was vice-president. Also many other prominent lay persons, men and women, were active in it, and groups were established among the French, Belgians, Poles, and Czechs who had fled to Great Britain and were living there in exile. But the totality of Catholics in the nation was not prepared for this movement. And because the other bishops had not previously been consulted, many of them gave no effective support. Nevertheless, it was at first enthusiastically welcomed by the Protestants. One of its first results was in December 1940 a declaration, signed by Cardinal Hinsley, by the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and by the moderator of the Free Church Federal Council. In it all accepted the five points of Pius XII for peace and added to them five criteria of their own, according to which economic situations and proposals could be examined. Such a cooperation with Protestants caused some Catholics to conjure up the danger of a dogmatic compromise or of indifferentism. Therefore the movement of the Sword of the Spirit soon decided, although it had invited to membership all men of good will who were willing to recognize the Catholic leadership, that non-Catholics could be only associate members without voting right. In spite of the disappointment thereupon expressed in some Protestant publications, Christian charity could be preserved thanks to the good offices of the Anglican bishop of Chichester, G. K. Bell, and others. The high point of this movement was reached in June 1942, when representatives of the Sword of the Spirit and those of Religion and Life, a similar movement among Protestants, composed a declaration on their collaboration, in which they appealed to the total Christian population of the country to act together in order to assure a noticeable influence of Christian teaching and of Christian witness in the solving of social, economic, and civil law problems at this time and in the postwar period. Accordingly, community weeks and meetings were held in all England, and local Christian councils were set up, not only to plan these events and realize them, but to put pressure on all parties who had to do with religious problems common to all denominations. This sort of interdenominational cooperation ceased when, with the end of the war, its chief propelling power was eliminated. The death of Cardinal Hinsley in March 1943 had deprived the Sword of the Spirit of his dynamic leadership, and in the first postwar years its activity generally slackened. Because of double work and overlapping, a coordination of its goals and actions with those of other Catholic societies could not be completely achieved. Under the new archbishop of Westminster, Cardinal Griffin, the center of gravity moved to the international area, to the social and political actions of Catholics on the continent, to the work of the United Nations and the special organizations affiliated to it, and to aid for refugees in Great Britain. In this way the "Sword" movement corresponded to a need which no other Catholic organization fulfilled. By 1954 it had lost its character as a mass movement and had become a center for the spread of information on all concerns of the Church in the whole world; furthermore, it was supposed, when necessary, to summon Catholic public opinion to action.

Catholics had always been free to support any of the greater political parties. Cardinals Bourne, Hinsley, and Griffin and other bishops frequently gave this answer when questions arose in regard to the Labour Party and its alleged championing of socialism. Most Catholics belonging to the working class actually preferred the Labour Party by an overwhelming majority; such membership for its party helped to prevent the party from developing into socialism.

Catechetical and Apologetic Work

The organized catechetical and apologetic work of the Catholic Church in Great Britain was promoted in various ways. The Catholic Truth Society, founded in 1884, circulated small and inexpensive writings, including some with a devotional and pedagogical content for Catholics and others for the information of Protestants. The founder of the society, James Britten, worked zealously up to his death in 1924. When in 1921–22 the headquarters of the society was moved and enlarged in order to accommodate a circulating library, an expansion of the program was due to the leadership talent and professional knowledge of an American, William Reed-Lewis. The publications of the society and its lectures were often concerned with particular themes of current interest, such as social and political ideologies in the years after 1920 and 1930, and later with birth control; but such controversial writings were never so important to the society as those which were aimed at the instruction of Catholics. Branch offices were set up throughout England and also in Scotland, Australia, India, Hong Kong, and the United States.

Another method for the instruction of non-Catholics was street-preaching, which was directed to all who wished to stop and listen. This was the function of the Catholic Evidence Guild, which Vernon Redwood, a New Zealander, had founded in London, with the permission of Cardinal Bourne, in 1918 shortly after the end of the war. The first guild worked only in the archdiocese of Westminster, but eventually independent guilds were also founded in other English dioceses and in the United States and Australia. In the springtime of the first guild there was elaborated a training program which took care of teaching courses in theology, philosophy, and Scripture; it was brought to the candidates, as meetings were held in the open; they were examined by study directors and other chaplains whom the local bishop had appointed, and there was also present a lay person, who as advocatus diaboli represented the crowd of listeners. The Marble Arch in Hyde Park became the most popular spot for speaker platforms in London. This sort of presentation to the outside was limited to Catholic doctrine; controversial questions of a social and economic nature and all political questions were strictly excluded. The text of the guild, Catholic Evidence Training Outline, which first appeared in 1925 and thereafter in revision, had been composed by Frank Sheed and Maisie Ward, two of the best known lay members. Of course, the work of the guild was impaired by the war, but after that it was intensified. In 1949 there were eighteen guilds with a total of 638 members and 302 speakers ready to act in England.

Liturgical Movement

In Great Britain the liturgical movement had a slow start and achieved no very great success before the Second Vatican Council. The Society of Saint Gregory was founded in 1929. It published the periodical Music and Liturgy and conducted summer vacation courses. After World War II it expanded its area of work by giving up its earlier preference for music and shortened the name of its periodical to Liturgy. But the movement only obtained real esteem after the encyclical Mediator Dei and some decrees had been issued from Rome.

Samuel Gosling, an English priest, came to the conviction that the retention of Latin as the only liturgical language of the Roman Rite was a serious impediment to pastoral work. In 1943 he founded the English Liturgy Society for clerics and lay persons, who "want to promote the use of the vernacular in public Mass in so far as this is in harmony with the teachings and traditions of the Church." In the next year he started a small periodical, The English Liturgist, which he published until his death in 1950. The society obtained only modest support and encountered bitter opposition, but it exercised a direct influence even in the United States, where the American Vernacular Society was established in 1946.

Journalism

After 1914 only a few new newspapers and periodicals of importance were begun, but many of the old ones were continued. In 1915 Wilfrid Ward resigned as editor of the Dublin Review, but his successors continued the tradition on the same high level and with the same broad view, especially Shane Leslie, Denis Gwynn, and Christopher Dawson, who also composed numerous books, especially historical and biographical works. The periodical remained in the possession of the archbishop of Westminster. In 1961 its name was changed to Wiseman Review—shortly before, Norman St. John-Stevas became editor—and four years later again back to the Dublin Review. In the winter of 1968–69 it stopped appearing. Among the periodicals published by religious orders, the Month, the organ of the Jesuits, was continued in its original intellectual style until 1949. From then on its editor, Philip Caraman, S.J., began a new series, which devoted as much attention to literature and the arts as to theology and philosophy; this policy, for its part, was again changed in 1964. The Downside Review reflected the scholarship of the Benedictines in that abbey. In 1920 Bede Jarrett, O.P. founded Blackfriars as the organ of the Oxford Dominicans.

The weekly Tablet was continued by John George Snead-Cox until 1920 according to conservative guidelines, with little sympathy for the political ambitions of the Irish; it was essentially the mouthpiece of the old Catholic families. Its defensive and hostile attitude toward Anglicans was retained by Ernest Oldmeadow, a converted Methodist minister, whom Cardinal Bourne had chosen as editor in 1923 chiefly for his polemical skill. As religious controversies lost ever more in power of attraction, the circulation of the paper dropped to less than 3,000, and in 1936 Cardinal Bourne's successor sold the Tablet to a group of laymen, among them Douglas Woodruff, who then replaced Oldmeadow as editor; by expanding the areas of interest for the paper he succeeded in again stabilizing its existence. Woodruff made it an outstanding source of news, especially on foreign affairs, and he employed a number of competent journalists.

Among the other old weekly papers the London Universe prospered because it used the techniques of modern journalism. After it had acquired the Catholic Times in 1962, it increased its circulation to more than 300,000 and in this way became the most widespread religious newspaper in the entire country. Although the Catholic Times had likewise been modernized, it had retained more of its original character and for the future remained the preferred paper of many Catholics of Irish birth or ancestry. The Catholic Herald addressed a growing number of Catholic students at the provincial universities. When in 1934 a group of lay persons had acquired it, they completely transformed it. From then on Count Michael de la Bédoyère, who occupied a middle position between the Tablet and the Universe, edited it until 1962 in a very capable manner. After his retirement Desmond Fisher became editor and directed the paper as a journal of opinion, which treated world news of all sorts from the Catholic standpoint. The Glasgow Observer remained the only Catholic weekly published in Scotland; it appeared in the eastern and northern areas of the country under the title of Scottish Catholic Herald; it became in reality an affiliated enterprise of the London Catholic Herald. Some other English and Irish Catholic weekly papers also published Scottish editions. The Catholic Times ran for forty years as an appendage of the Welsh Catholic Times, which appeared at Cardiff and was stopped in 1962.

IRELAND

Population

In the twenty-six counties of the Republic of Ireland the number of Catholics in 1926 was altogether 2,751,269 in a total population of 2,971,992, and in 1961 it was 2,673,473 in a total of 2,818,341. After the acquiring of independence, the percentage of Catholics grew with each census, whereas the total population declined, because emigration was stronger than the natural growth. Thereby the republic became, in regard to religion, constantly more homogeneous. In addition, the great majority of these Catholics practiced their faith, and so Catholicism was more visible in Ireland than in any other English-speaking country. In the six counties of Northern Ireland, on the other hand, the total population grew from 1,256,561 in 1926 to 1,425,462 in 1961, while the number of Catholics increased from 420,428 to 498,031.

In 1916 there were in all thirty-two counties 3,022 diocesan priests and 715 religious priests. The religious institutes had 97 houses of priests, 131 convents of nuns, and 43 monasteries of monks. Fifty years later there were 3,964 diocesan priests and 2,072 religious priests. The religious institutes had 160 houses for priests, 201 for brothers, and 648 for nuns. Meanwhile many priests and religious had left Ireland to work in other English-speaking countries or in the missions.

Political Development

At the outbreak of World War I there was still violent debate on the already long spiritedly discussed question of Home Rule for Ireland. The chief difficulty resulted from the refusal of the Protestants in Ulster to accept an arrangement whereby Catholics would constitute the majority and so be in the position to bring clericalism to power or introduce a theocratic state. The Catholics, for their part, feared that in a partition of the island the Catholics in Ulster would be oppressed by a Protestant majority and that in the granting of autonomy to these northern parts of the country the principle of denominational education would be replaced by that of mixed education.

In the first years of the war the episcopate and clergy generally supported the participation of the Irish in the mobilization and recruiting. But at the end of 1915 this original enthusiasm for the war exertions changed to apathy. Edward Thomas O'Dwyer, bishop of Limerick, declared that it was England's and not Ireland's war. Although the hierarchy had several times condemned the Irish Republican Brotherhood, which organized the uprising in 1916, it did not unanimously disavow the rising. The rebel leaders, who took part in the Easter rebellion were at least nominally Catholics, and of those who were jailed and condemned to death all except one received the sacraments before their execution by the British. However, public opinion as a whole condemned the immoral means they had used to assert the claim of the Irish people to independence. Of course, then the cruel treatment by the British government brought the rebels the sympathy of the people. Bishop O'Dwyer expressed the general indignation at the harshness of the British suppression.

When the Irish Parliamentary Party had lost the confidence of the public, the bishops and especially the younger priests gradually gave preference to the Sinn Fein Movement and at the same time helped to keep it from recourse to physical force. In fact, between May 1916 and the beginning of 1919 no noteworthy acts of violence occurred in Ireland. In this period the participation of those who claimed the title Sinn Fein conferred on the usual operations of a political party of the new movement the aura of trustworthiness which it needed in order to find the approval of the clergy on a broader basis. The primate of All Ireland and archbishop of Armagh, Cardinal Michael Logue, however, expressed in a pastoral letter of November 1917 his opposition to the Sinn Fein, because he regarded its dream of establishing an Irish Republic as a utopia, which would likely end in disaster.

When the military service law was submitted to parliament, in order to give the government authority to apply the conscription of troops also to Ireland, which had hitherto been exempted from it, the permanent committee of the bishops and individual bishops warned the British government in the spring of 1918 against the effort to force through such a law. Later the entire hierarchy condemned compulsory conscription as an inhuman law of suppression. The Irish people, they said, had the right to resist this law by every means that was in accord with the law of God. The bishops instructed the clergy to use certain practical measures to avert this wrong. By the fact that they placed themselves at the head of the campaign against the draft, the bishops maintained their influence on the people and fostered in fact, especially in the west, a better cooperation between the clergy and the Sinn Fein.

After the Dáil Éireann had proclaimed the Irish Republic in 1919, the Anglo-Irish war erupted. The British government tried to induce the bishops to condemn the rebels, but they refused. Some bishops openly supported the loan of the Dáil. When in 1919 the Dáil instituted courts of arbitration, it took care that priests were ex officio judges in these courts for lesser legal cases. Thus through the lower clergy the Church acquired a voice in the national movement without the risks of a direct commitment of the bishops. The participation of the clergy in the courts also gave the republic at least a certain degree of legitimacy. When the Irish Republican Army (IRA) led its pitiless attacks on the British troops, and the latter exercised brutal retaliation, many bishops declared that the attacks of the IRA were deplorable but understandable in view of the suppression by the authorities. In October 1920 the hierarchy censured the furious reprisals of the government as cruelties and excesses. Because many volunteers maintained with the assent of a few clerics that the killing of a policeman or of a British soldier was not murder but a war action, the bishop of Galway, Thomas O'Dea, made clear the Church's view that no legal authority in Ireland had declared or authorized war against the police. Nevertheless, many priests approved membership in the IRA. With the approval of the Dáil, its president, Eamon De Valera, proclaimed in March 1921 the formal acknowledgment of a state of war with England and responsibility for the actions of the IRA. But when in June De Valera personally asked the hierarchy for a formal recognition of the republic, the bishops merely emphasized the right of Ireland to choose its own form of government. The agreement of December 1921 between the British government and the Irish plenipotentiaries on the establishing of the Irish Free State was welcomed by the Church with a feeling of relief and joy. The hierarchy as such did not approve this agreement, but several bishops did so as individuals.

After the treaty had been ratified by the Dáil Éireann in 1922, De Valera and the IRA rejected it and the government created by it. At first the bishops hoped for a constitutional solution of the crisis; only when the obdurate Republicans led by De Valera began the civil war against the new government led by William T. Cosgrave as president did the hierarchy announce a general excommunication of all those against the treaty. In a common pastoral letter of 10 October 1922 the hierarchy declared that the government of the Free State possessed the legitimate authority, that it was a serious wrong to resist it by armed force, and that the guerrilla war continued by the Republicans was to be condemned. The Republicans, on the other hand, disdained this condemnation and continued the war until De Valera summoned his adherents the following spring to stop hostilities. Although some few among the Republicans were still resentful toward the Church for decades, De Valera did not become the rallying point for an anticlerical party.

Ecclesiastical Organization

When Ireland was politically divided, this did not affect the territorial integrity of the Church. From then on the ecclesiastical and the political spheres of jurisdiction no longer coincided. The four provinces with twenty-eight dioceses retained their previous boundaries, and the hierarchy continued to act as a single body. Generally, the bishops met twice a year, and a permanent committee, consisting of the four archbishops, two bishops as secretaries, and one member elected from each province, met quarterly. National councils in which representatives of the lower clergy and the religious institutes took part were held at Maynooth in 1927 and 1956.

Relations with the State

In 1929 the Irish Free State established full diplomatic relations with the Holy See. Thereafter, an apostolic nuncio resided at Dublin, and an Irish ambassador at Rome. The first nuncio was Paschal Robinson, who occupied this post until his death in 1948; he was born in Ireland and grew up in the United States. A concordat was never discussed.

In the absence of the Republican delegates, who declined to recognize the Dáil elected in 1922, a constitution for the Free State was decided by this body in the same year. In it the Catholic Church was not even mentioned; freedom of religion was merely guaranteed to every citizen, and all laws were declared null and void which would subsidize any religion or give preference to anyone because of his religious faith or his position. Nevertheless, from the start the Cosgrave governments, which consisted predominantly of Catholic ministers, and the Dáil dominated by him showed their readiness to employ the power of the state for the protection of Catholic moral values. Thus in 1923 they approved the law for film censorship, in 1924 and 1927 the laws against strong alcoholic drink, and in 1929 the law for the censorship of publications, provided by a censorship committee consisting of one Catholic priest as chairman, three Catholic laymen, and one Protestant.

In 1927 De Valera and a majority of the Republicans decided to enter the Dáil as the Fianna Fail Party. A minority of unreconciled Republicans, under the name of the Irish Republican Army, rejected the status quo for the future and strove for the forcible union of Northern Ireland with the twenty-six counties. The hierarchy formally condemned the IRA in a common pastoral letter of 1931. At the same time it also condemned as Communist the Saor Eire organization allied with it. The Saor Eire gradually disappeared, but the IRA remained active, and the Communist influence in it was furthermore strong. By 1935 the bishops in their Lenten pastoral letter frequently warned the faithful against Communism. In January 1956 the hierarchy again condemned the IRA and declared it was a "mortal sin for a Catholic to become or to remain a member of an organization or society which claims the right to bear arms or to use them against its own or another state," and "likewise sinful for a Catholic to cooperate with such an organization or society, to applaud it, or to support it in other ways." Nevertheless, many pious Catholics still supported the IRA. These Irish accepted the authority of the Church in the sphere of religion but rejected it in the area of politics.

When De Valera became Prime Minister in 1932, he continued the policy of his predecessors with the upholding of Catholic values and even identified "Irish" with "Catholic." Thus the supplementary decree of 1935 to the penal law forbade the sale and the import of contraceptive means (Section 17), and the law against public dance establishments of the same year eliminated an evil against which bishops and priests had long taken the field.

The constitution of 1937 respected Catholic teaching in regard to the family, marriage, education, and private ownership. With special reference to religion it declared: "The state recognizes the special position of the Holy Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church as the custodian of the faith which the great majority of citizens profess" (ARTICLE 44). It also recognized the Protestant, the Jewish, and other religions existing in the nation. This article had been introduced on De Valera's personal initiative; the bishops had not asked such recognition. Afterwards the authorities never agreed whether the "special position" could have any juridical effect. Although this constitution championed Catholic values to a greater degree than that of 1922, the state still did not always concede to the Church the status of a person in public law and also no financial means or subsidies at all. The Church itself was not empowered to possess property or to undertake public-law activities; it always had to employ the trustee system and obtain its entire income from the voluntary gifts of the people. On the other hand, the state claimed no influence on the naming of bishops or on other internal affairs of the Church. The Supreme Court of the Irish Free State had declared in 1926 that the canon law of the Catholic Church was a foreign law in civil law and in civil courts, whose validity had to be proved by expert witnesses. The constitution of 1937 did not change the status of canon law and thereby did not exclude the difficulties which occurred in marriage-law cases from the differences between canon law and civil law, although the constitution also forbade divorce.

In the south no large political party ever assumed an anticlerical attitude. Even the Labour Party supported the upholding of Catholic value concepts.

Educational System

Nevertheless, the Irish Free State was helpful to the Church in the area of education and allowed it to exercise over the schools in the twenty-six counties more control than in any other country in the world. In the constitution of 1937 the state recognized the family as the proper and natural teacher of the child; it guaranteed respect for the unalterable right and duty of the parents to care, in accord with their means, for the religious and moral, intellectual, physical, and social education of their children. For primary education, up to the age of fourteen, the state also granted for the future subsidies to all school boards which complied with its instructions; these subsidies were to cover the salaries of teachers, specified maintenance expenses, and two-thirds of the construction costs for new schools—more than two-thirds in areas of poverty. The state did not establish a competing system of its own. The primary schools were in private ownership, and almost all were allied with one or another denomination. Each school was controlled by a school director, who appointed the teachers; in the case of the Catholic schools the pastor was usually also the school director. On the other hand the state prescribed the curriculum, inspected the schools, and gave the examinations. Some of the Catholic secondary schools were the property of lay persons, but most were in the possession of dioceses or religious institutes. On this basis, by a law of 1924 the Irish Free State introduced a system of per capita subsidies under the condition that definite rules were observed. These subsidies proved to be ever less adequate, but they were not raised until 1954. In June 1964 the Catholic Church managed 4,848 primary schools with 489,448 pupils, out of a total of 502,201 pupils in the republic. There were altogether 573 Catholic secondary schools in the academic year 1964–65, and they educated 92,989 pupils.

Irish politicians were satisfied with the school system, which left control in the hands of clerics. The bishops reacted promptly to every proposal to reduce their influence. But from 1963 several important reforms in the educational system were prescribed by law with the consent or at least the approval of the hierarchy.

In the field of higher education the hierarchy had, long before the achieving of independence, asked for the erecting of a university which was acceptable to Catholics. In 1908 the British government agreed to this request with the founding of the National University of Ireland, with colleges at Dublin, Cork, and Galway. Although formally nondenominational, it was intended to assure a considerable influence to the Catholic hierarchy in its governing bodies. Nevertheless, the archbishop of Dublin, John Charles McQuaid, considered it necessary in 1944 to forbid Catholics "to enter the Protestant university of Trinity College without the previous permission of the diocesan bishop," and he declared that disobedience to this prescription was a mortal sin, and perseverance in disobedience made one unworthy to receive the sacraments. The National Council of 1956 likewise forbade Catholic youth, under threat of mortal sin, to attend Trinity College and Catholic parents or guardians to send young men there. Only the archbishop of Dublin should be competent to decide under what circumstances and with what guarantees against the danger of apostasy attendance at this institution could be tolerated. In practice, however, dispensations were frequently granted.

Social Movement

In the first three decades of the twentieth century the social movement was relatively weak among Irish Catholics because they had to devote their energies chiefly to the political struggle and the work of church building and the religious organization. The social movement was delayed also by the intellectual backwardness of the Catholic population. Progress was speeded after the publication of the encyclical Quadragesimo Anno by Pius XI in 1931. In the same year Father John Hayes founded Muintir na Tire (People of the Land), a production association, which later held agricultural weekends and weeks and study congresses. It developed into a movement for the improvement of social life in the rural areas of Ireland, which was threatened with annihilation by the irresistible march of industrialization. Local societies were formed, which represented each sector of the community, and particular interests were subsumed under a higher group on the level of the parish, which represented the organizational unity. This movement was not formally Catholic, but Catholic priests and laity actively supported it. Prominent Protestants were also members of these local societies and took part in the meetings. The underlying ideology can be termed "occupational." Muintir na Tire became one of the most important intermediaries for the spread of Catholic social doctrine in Ireland.

Among the newspapers, the weekly The Standard, founded in 1928, was from 1938 on the most effective organ for propagating Catholic social teaching; its preference was the association system. Its editor-in-chief, Doctor Alfred O'Rahilly, professor and later president of the University College at Cork, wrote on economic and religious themes.

In the late 1930s the bishops proclaimed social doctrine ever more loudly in their pastoral letters. Three bishops were especially known for their interest in the social question: John Dignan of Clonfert, who in 1936 accepted from the government the chairmanship of the new national social security for the sick; Michael Brown of Galway, who stubbornly opposed every inappropriate spread of state power; Archbishop McQuaid, who devoted his special attention to social welfare. In 1941 McQuaid created the Catholic Social Service Conference for the coordination and spread of charitable work in view of the deficient situation, because of the war, in nourishment, clothing, and especially heating material as well as in the areas of dwellings, occupation, and care of mothers. The conference used voluntary cooperation and obtained aid from the state and local officials. In Dublin it changed the type and manner of social work.

The founding of the Christus Rex Society announced new progress of the social movement; it was approved by the Irish hierarchy in 1945 and held its first congress the next year. Its membership was restricted to diocesan priests, but members of religious institutes and lay persons often gave talks at the annual congresses. Its goals were: "to clarify public opinion on social questions and help in the forming of a public awareness that is sensitive to social grievances . . . ; to promote the study of Catholic social doctrine among the clergy and through them among the laity; to encourage Irish priests to common exertions with a view to abolishing social evils and realizing the principles of the social encyclicals in public life." In 1947 the society began the publication of the quarterly Christus Rex, which became the leading periodical for the discussion of social questions in Ireland.

One of the best known publicists and speakers on social questions in the postwar period was Cornelius Lucey, professor of ethics at Maynooth from 1921 to 1951, coadjutor bishop of Cork from 1951 to 1952, and from 1952 bishop of Cork. Bishop Brown also gave expression to his views on public affairs. Both bishops represented conservative ideas.

When the government proposed a law for the "Care for Mother and Child," the hierarchy unanimously decided in April 1951 that this plan was opposed to Catholic social doctrine. Then when the minister of health, Doctor Noel Browne, resigned for various reasons, there began in the press a controversy on the role of the hierarchy. The bishops were concerned about the dangers which resulted from the growth of the state's power and the possibility of an un-Christian sexual teaching. When in 1952 the government proposed a new health law, the hierarchy likewise intervened in order to put through a few supplements, as, for example, one which assured the free choice of a hospital for each individual. The chief reason for the efforts of the Irish hierarchy to exert influence on the precise prescriptions for social services in the country was that it was against the centralizing tendencies of the government and its bureaucratic forms. But still, on the whole relations between the hierarchy and the government were friendly from 1923 to 1970; there were only a few cases of open conflict.

In contrast to other European countries with a large Catholic proportion in the population, in Ireland no workers' union was created which was fostered by or united with the Church. The political exertions and actions of the workers' movement were aimed at avoiding church objections, and the danger of Marxist infiltration declined after 1921. The example and the influence of the British unions and the desire to maintain unity with the numerous Protestant workers in the north constituted further factors, which saw to it that the workers' movement in Ireland remained totally secular.

Lay Apostolate

In 1921 there was founded at Dublin that organization which was to become one of the largest organized movements of the lay apostolate in the whole world: the Legion of Mary. A group of lay persons, motivated by awareness of their Christian vocation to be witnesses and inspired by the teachings of the Popes, met in the church of Saint Nicholas of Myra in Francis Street with the curate, Father Michael Toher, to seek suitable methods with which they could transform their discussions on the mystical body of Christ and the writings of Saint Louis Marie Grignion de Montfort into concrete action for the service of their fellow men. The form of their organization was influenced also by the Saint Vincent De Paul Society, with which they were all connected. Their lay leader was Frank Duff, a young state official. Originally the new society was called Association of Our Lady of Mercy; in 1925 the name was changed to the Legion of Mary, and the titles which were given to all parts of its organization were taken from the usage of the old Roman army. The work began with visiting the sick in the South Dublin Union Hospital. Soon the legion directed its attention to organized prostitution and opened at Dublin its first home for prostitutes. In 1927 it founded the Morning Star Home for destitute men and the Regina Coeli Home for women.

The legion decided that its membership should be open to men and women from all educational strata, so long as they were practicing Catholics and at least eighteen years old. It was expected of the members that they lead an exemplary life and possess the "spirit of the Legion" or desire to possess it. They had to take part in the weekly meeting of their group, in which they were formed and spiritually stimulated by legion prayers, spiritual reading, and guidance from the spiritual leader; also they had to devote a considerable part of their free time each week to an apostolic work allotted to them, at least two hours. It was required of each member as his personal responsibility to recruit new members, both active and auxiliary. Auxiliary members performed only a service of prayer. The leadership of the legion lies in a concilium, the headquarters of which has always remained at Dublin. It was to consist of representatives of all legionary societies which were in immediate relations with it, and of the members of the Dublin curia and of the spiritual director appointed by the Irish bishops. This strict supervision of the lesser units by the superior councils assured, together with the manual of guidelines, which was later translated into twenty-five languages and 125 dialects, the uniformity of the legion throughout the world. The legion declared its readiness to carry out any type of social service and Catholic Action, which the local ordinary or parish priest asked or approved. At the weekly meeting of the praesidia, the smallest units, an oral report had to be made on the work done and then the work for the coming week was assigned. Gradually the house visits of legionaries, who went in pairs, became their characteristic activity. Also, the legion took care of homes, clubs, and study groups, distributed pamphlets and Lenten books, and gave catechetical instruction. All these activities had to be directed to individuals, but the giving of material help was forbidden. In the forty years since the founding, more than 60,000 active groups were founded, which worked in more than 1,500 dioceses, vicariates, and prefectures on five continents. In 1964 there were more than 1 million active and more than 9 million auxiliary members. A legion was first established in the United States in 1931.

North America

THE UNITED STATES

Population

In 1914 it was assumed that the Catholic population of the United States amounted to 16,067,985 with 18,568 priests in a total population of 99,117,567. In 1964 the Catholic population had increased to 44,874,371 in a total population of 183,783,493. Although it continued to grow after that, the rate of growth had already declined, in that year it amounted to 1.7 percent in comparison to 2.4 percent in 1963. The downward trend in the number of baptisms began in 1962 and was doubtless an indication that the practice of artificial birth control had spread further and that the national birthrate was reflected in it. In the same decade other high points were also reached, which were then followed by a decline: 59,892 priests in 1967, 181,421 sisters in 1966, and 12,539 brothers in 1967. The degree of "shrinkage" in the Catholic population has not been ascertained exactly, but it must have been considerable.

The immigration from Europe, through which the Catholic population had grown so rapidly until 1914, first dropped because of World War I and thereafter because of restrictive laws. These laws were motivated in part by the fear on the part of Protestants that the country could be inundated by Catholics and Jews. The Emergency Quota Law of 1921 limited the number of immigrants from each country per year to 3 percent of the respective national group living in the United States in 1910. The Immigration Law of 1924 reduced this number to 2 percent and set the population figure of 1890 in place of that of 1910 until the newly prescribed system took effect in 1929; from then on, a quota of immigrants was granted for each European country which was based on the proportion which the members of a specific nationality who had lived in the United States in 1920 had possessed in the same year in regard to the total number of the population; the key figure was 150,000. These measures greatly lessened the entrance of Catholics from eastern, central, and southern Europe, and in 1931 President Hoover lowered the quotas so strongly because of unemployment that the immigration of European Catholics almost stopped entirely for the rest of this decade. However, hundreds of thousands of Mexicans and French Canadians, who were exempted from the quota restrictions, moved across the southern and northern frontiers. There also came Catholics from American possessions, especially Puerto Ricans, who settled in New York and some other cities, and Filipinos, who went to California. After World War II Spanish-speaking Catholics poured into the northern cities, and many European Catholics came into the country in accord with the stipulations of the Displaced Persons Act of 1948. The principle of national origin, which favored the Nordic peoples, was again confirmed in the McCarran-Walter Law of 1952, despite the protests of Catholics and others.

The Church gradually lost its immigrant status and its opposition attitude and thereby gained more and more esteem among non-Catholics. Besides, after World War II more Americans than previously acknowledged their membership in a denomination. Many of them felt attracted to the Catholic Church, which constituted the largest individual body in the country and conducted respected institutions on the local and national level. By the fact that the Church exposed itself more to the glare of publicity, it brought the blind zealots to silence and gained more open ears for its demands. The apostolate for converts gained in esteem through the holding of hours of consultation in the parishes, through the free distribution of literature, for which advertisements in the secular newspapers solicited, and through individual talks with entirely individual instruction. In this way 146,212 converts were received into the Church in 1960; this was the highest number which was ever ascertained for a single year. In the following period the annual figures dropped again.

A constantly increasing percentage of Catholics lived in cities. Even in 1967 there were of the altogether 3,080 rural districts in the United States still 671 without a permanent priest. The fact that almost 40 million Americans did not live within reach of a priest was characteristic of the predominantly urban character of American Catholicism.

Of the approximately 20,300,000 blacks in the United States, only 747,598 were Catholics in 1964.

Organization

In 1914 there were in the United States fourteen ecclesiastical provinces and eighty-four dioceses; in addition, there was still one vicariate apostolic and one Ruthenian Greek diocese. At this time there were 9,740 churches with resident priests and 4,911 missions with churches. Fifty years later there were 27 archdioceses, 114 dioceses, one Ukrainian Catholic archeparchy, two Ukrainian Catholic eparchies, and two eparchies of the Byzantine Rite. In these jurisdictional areas there were 17,455 parishes, 515 missions, and 4,594 stations. The archdiocese with the largest number of Catholics was Chicago.

Although the archbishops took care to hold annual meetings, the entire hierarchy was not organized until September 1919 when 92 of the existing 101 ordinaries took part in the first general meeting at the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. They decided by an overwhelming majority to establish the National Catholic Welfare

Council, as the organization was originally called. It was a logical further development of the National Catholic War Council, which had been founded in August 1917 by the delegates of sixty-eight dioceses and twenty-seven national Catholic associations to coordinate the efforts of the popular Catholic groups in the contemporary emergency by six committees of priests and lay persons, which in turn were active under a controlling committee of bishops. The effectiveness of the war council in its various efforts made it seem desirable to have a permanent organization on the national level for the coordination and stimulation of actions in the period of peace. Pope Benedict XV had in a general way agreed that commissions for the handling of school and social problems should be set up and that they should hold annual general meetings. But because some bishops feared that the organization would interfere in the jurisdiction of the ordinary in their own dioceses, they transmitted their objections to the Holy See. Cardinal Gaetano De Lai, secretary of the Consistorial Congregation, and some other officials of the Roman Curia for their part were afraid that the NCWC would promote the beginnings of a "national" Church in the United States. They persuaded Benedict XV to revoke the approval granted by him provisionally and by way of experiment. He had already drafted a decree for the dissolution of the organization but was prevented by death from signing it. His successor, Pius XI, thereupon signed this decree and had it published. The administrative committee of the NCWC protested against this decision and delegated from its ranks the bishop of Cleveland, Joseph Schrembs, to explain the arguments of the NCWC at Rome. In protracted discussions he convinced De Lai and other cardinals. On 2 July 1922 a new decree was issued which approved the organization according to the original plan; only the name was easily changed by substituting the word "Conference" for "Council"; in this way the organization, which was erected on a voluntary basis and had only an advisory function, could not be misunderstood as a legislative body. However, it became the highest authority in the decisions of the Catholic Church on public affairs and on the implementing of commonly agreed-upon guidelines. In addition to the administrative council there were created right from the start five departments: for education, lay activity, press, social action, and the missions; three more, for immigration, legal questions, and youth, were later added. The first business manager or secretary general was John Burke, C.S.P., the former editor of the Catholic World and chairman of the meeting at which the war council had been founded and also chairman of the Committee for Special Actions in the period of the war. He served in this position until his death in 1936. The NCWC continued its function until it was reorganized in 1967 and thereafter, as the United States Catholic Conference, constituted a corporation in civil law. At the same time the National Conference of Catholic Bishops came into existence as a canon law corporation.

In these years the founding of parishes continued on the territorial and national level. When the world economic crisis began, the Poles alone had approximately one thousand parishes in the United States. When after World War II many Catholics began to move from the large cities to the suburbs, the number of national parishes declined.

Educational System

In 1914 there were 230 Catholic colleges or high schools for young men and 680 academies or high schools for girls; in addition, there were 5,403 parochial schools, attended by 1,429,859 children. In 1964 there were 1,557 high schools of the dioceses and parishes with 677,169 students and 901 private high schools, for the most part conducted by religious men and women, with 391,255 students. At the same time 4,471,415 pupils were registered in 10,452 elementary schools of the parishes and institutes, and 85,201 in 450 private elementary schools. After 1964 began a downward trend in proportion to the previous numbers of registrations, not only in the Catholic but also in the public schools.

During this period Catholic schools were affected by several state laws on which, one after the other, decisions were rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States. In 1922 the voters of Oregon approved a petition in which it was required that, with a few expressly named exceptions, all children from age 8 to age 16 had to attend public schools from September 1926, in connection with which parents or guardians who disobeyed this law were to be condemned to a fine or prison or—in each case according to the seriousness—to both. Two societies of Freemasons claimed the authorship of this law, and the Ku Klux Klan, along with other secret societies, supported it with the assertion that only in public schools could children be taught to respect and maintain the free institutions of the nation. Religious prejudice, patriotic zeal, and nationalistic mistrust were the chief motives for the advocates of this law. Both the already existing and the recently founded Catholic organizations resisted, and even several Protestant groups issued declarations in which the law was condemned. The Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, who operated several schools in Oregon, and the Mill Hill Academy filed motions for the issuance of a temporary injunction by which the state should be forbidden to put the law into effect. After the District Court of the United States had issued the injunction in 1924, the state attorney general of Oregon appealed to the Supreme Court. But in the meantime the legislature of Michigan had agreed that constitutional amendments on voting should be submitted to the voters whereby the parochial schools in this state should be abolished. But in 1924 these proposals were rejected by considerable majorities, after similar proposals there had already been rejected four years earlier. In 1925 the Supreme Court of the United States declared the Oregon law unconstitutional, confirmed the rights of parents, and set limits to state authority. This decision annulled all other attempts to do away with Catholic schools by way of legislation.

In the following period other states sought to assist in various ways children who attended nonpublic schools, but these were attacked in the courts. In 1930 the Supreme Court confirmed as constitutional a law of Louisiana which allowed the state to supply textbooks to children in all schools. This decision was based on the theory that not the schools themselves or their administrators, the churches, were the beneficiaries of such state grants, but the children. This theory of "child benefit" became the justification for the asking of state aid for children in private schools. In the celebrated case Everson vs. Board of Education the Supreme Court in 1947 recognized as constitutional a law of New Jersey, which approved the use of public funds to reimburse parents for expenses incurred by transporting their children to all schools, public or private. Nevertheless, only less than half of all states put buses at the disposal of children who attended private schools. In 1968 the Supreme Court of the United States decided that neither the individual state constitution nor the Constitution of the United States was violated by a law of the state of New York which demanded that the public schools lend nonreligious schoolbooks to pupils in private schools, including the parochial, in grades seven through twelve. In the same year the state of Pennsylvania granted direct payment of public money to private schools for services in nonreligious school subjects. But the Supreme Court of the United States later declared this law invalid because the concept of the "purchase of services" was incompatible with the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The constitutions of thirty-three states forbade any use of public funds for the support of denominational schools.

Some bishops and other Catholics had, besides, not wanted any state aid for their schools, because they feared an interference, joined with it, of the state into the Church's control of the schools. In 1961 the administrative committee NCWC stated that the federal government, if it generally supported the school system, must also give to Catholic children the right to claim support, because they were otherwise victims of a discriminatory legislation. Nevertheless, Congress excluded nonpublic schools from the aid which it granted to the schools in specific districts, in which special burdens were laid on the local taxpayers by a federal institution. The 1965 Elementary and Secondary Education Act, also called the Johnson Education Act, included also the children of private schools by granting them a share in specific special programs, which were undertaken by a local educational office and implemented by a public school; thus, for example, courses for the physically handicapped or socially ill-adapted children, supplementary classes in reading and mathematics, library services, health and food services, books, and even clothing—of course, only for children from low income families. The constitutionality of this law was doubted by various groups, as by Protestants and other Americans United for the Separation of Church and State, by the American Jewish Congress, and by the American Civil Liberties Union, all of which constantly strove to prevent any public aid, even indirect, for Catholic schools.

The regulations for the imparting of religious instruction to Catholic children who attended public schools varied according to the laws of the particular states. There arose controversies over other stipulations according to which pupils were granted absence from the public schools for a specified time to enable them to take part in religious instruction. When in 1948 an objection was raised before the Supreme Court of the United States to a plan approved by the legislature of the state of Illinois, the Supreme Court forbade the imparting of religious instruction on the premises of public schools during school hours and declared such a practice a violation of the First Amendment. However, four years later the same court declared that "released time" programs were constitutional if the pupils left the public school during regular school hours in order to receive denominational religious instruction. In 1964 there were 1,119,800 students in public high schools on released time and 3,067,794 pupils in elementary schools on leave of absence who received Catholic religious instruction.

Responsibility for the assuring of religious instruction for these children in public schools was entrusted to the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine. Although the confraternity had been introduced in the United States as early as 1902, it had grown only slowly until Pius XI issued his motu proprio Orbem Catholicum in 1923. The best-known promoter of the Confraternity in the United States was Edwin V. O'Hara, first bishop of Great Falls, Montana (1930–39), then of Kansas City, Missouri (1939–56); he was also chairman of the Bishops' Commission from its founding in 1934 until his death in 1956. Under his leadership a Catholic center was erected in Washington, D.C., in 1933 to provide information and advice to the diocesan organizations. Besides the instruction of children who attended public schools, the confraternity organized in many places programs for religious vacation courses, discussion clubs for parents, teachers, and adults, special religious courses for handicapped children, correspondence courses in religion, training centers for lay teachers of religion, university retreats, religious radio programs, and an apostolate of goodwill which was aimed at those outside the Church. In 1935 the first national Catechetical Congress was held in Rochester, New York, and this was then followed by yearly congresses until 1941, when a five-year cycle was introduced. The publications department of the national center published an information service, which was intended especially for diocesan directors, and also textbooks and other practical literature. In the early 1940s the confraternity subsidized revisions of the several editions of the Baltimore Catechism and a new translation of the Bible. It introduced the new catechetical methods and techniques developed in Europe and adapted them to American needs.

In the area of higher education there were in 1964 295 Catholic colleges and universities, in which 366,172 students were registered. The Catholic colleges had increased in this period; between 1914 and 1956 thirty colleges for men were opened, but in the last-mentioned year nine of them were again closed. Thirty-seven colleges for women were founded between 1915 and 1925, and nineteen between 1925 and 1930; in 1950 there were 116 colleges for women and in 1970 there were 137. Some Catholic colleges were too small to be able to maintain an academic level; some were so close to one another geographically that they competed for potential students, and none of them was adequately equipped. But the Catholic institutions of the higher educational system received, in contrast to the Catholic elementary and secondary schools, some state aid directly. Thus, for example, the veterans of World War II and of the Korean War obtained federal funds for instruction and livelihood, regardless of what educational institution they decided on, and the National Defense Education Act of 1958, which was intended to improve instruction in mathematics, natural science, engineering, and modern languages and in 1964 was extended also to English, geography, and other fields, made no distinction in regard to Catholic colleges and universities; it even granted loans for schools of the middle level which belonged to the Church. Federal officials made agreements with such schools for research projects or granted them subsidies for this purpose, and there were also federal funds at their disposal for the construction of buildings.

In the late 1950s 9 Catholic universities had graduate schools, which could grant doctoral degrees, but half of them restricted their doctoral program to a few fields. The Catholic universities and colleges also instituted many professional school faculties. In 1955 23 of them had professional schools for management or commerce and finance, 6 for medicine, 21 for law, 12 for engineering and architecture, 14 for nursing, 10 for education, 8 for dentistry, 5 for pharmacy, 4 for music, 6 for social service, 2 for industrial relations, 1 for diplomacy, 1 for physical education, 1 for journalism, and 1 for oratory. Many other Catholic colleges and universities had programs for some of these professional areas but they had not organized them as separate professional schools. In 1936, furthermore, 42 Catholic teachers' seminars were conducted; but when colleges and universities began to offer programs in pedagogy the number of teachers' seminars declined. In 1955 there were 3 diocesan teachers' colleges and 21 normal teachers' seminars which were under Catholic direction; of the latter a few were only for the members of religious institutes, while others also admitted lay persons as students.

The Newman Movement was organized for the religious instruction and pastoral care of the ever growing number of Catholic students who attended secular universities and colleges. By 1925 a few bishops and priests, especially Jesuits, attacked the concept of such Catholic foundations as that which had begun in 1920 at the University of Illinois to offer religious courses recognized at the university; the opponents feared that a positive program of religious instruction would attract students to the secular universities who would otherwise have gone to Catholic colleges. The educational importance of the Newman apostolate was not officially recognized until 1962, when the College and University Division of the National Catholic Educational Association completed its regulations to the effect that it gave membership to Newman educational centers, even if not full membership.

The Federation of Catholic College Clubs was established in New York City in 1915; although it consisted officially only of student clubs, it was in reality directed by the faculties, alumni, and chaplains. In 1938 it became the Newman Club Federation. Due to the efforts of its chaplain general, John W. Keough, who watched over its growth from 1917 to 1935, it successfully resisted the persistent opposition. In fact, for many years it was merely tolerated by the church authorities. But in 1941 it obtained full membership in the College and University Division of the National Council of Catholic Youth, which had been instituted by the American hierarchy. Then it acquired a permanent headquarters with a managing secretary in the Youth Division of the NCWC. After World War II the number of full-time chaplains rapidly grew, and in 1950 the National Newman Chaplains Association was established as an organization. In addition to the meetings and institutes which it offered, in 1962 it opened an institution for the training of new chaplains. In order to gain Catholic teachers and administrators from secular institutions for these unions, the National Newman Association of Faculty and Staff was called into being in 1959. In 1962 the various national organizations were united and formally approved as constituents of the National Newman Apostolate, which for its part became a fully qualified section in the Youth Division of the NCWC. In the meantime religious sisters and brothers and educated laymen in ever greater numbers had been appointed to the staffs of the Catholic centers and parishes that were reproducing themselves at secular universities in order to support the chaplains with their teaching and pastoral tasks. In 1965 there were 250 full-time chaplains and 1,022 part-time chaplains who worked in 203 Newman Centers and in other quarters determined by chance at more than 900 secular institutions and there cared for more than 800,000 Catholic students.

American Catholics were also concerned with creating special possibilities of education for blacks. The Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament for Indians and Colored People, established by Mother Katharine Drexel, erected many elementary and high schools for blacks in the South. With the financial support of the foundress, the sisters opened Xavier University of Louisiana, for which the arrangements were concluded in 1918; colleges for the humanities and natural sciences, for teachers and for pharmacy were opened at the beginning of the 1920s, and in 1937 a graduate school which offered the master's degree. This was the first and only Catholic university for blacks in the United States. After World War II blacks, including the Catholics, left the rural areas of the South in ever greater numbers for the large cities in the North and the far West, where they were closer to the Church's ministry. Most of the black beneficiaries of Catholic educational work were non-Catholics. The same was true also of the social services performed by Catholics, as, for example, of the Friendship Houses of Catherine De Hueck, of which the first was founded in 1938 in Harlem, the black quarter of New York, and also of Fides House, erected in 1940 at Washington, D.C.

Social Movement

From the end of World War I the Catholic Church in the United States became actively involved in social justice. In 1919 the administrative committee of the National Catholic War Council published an announcement which in the future was called the "Bishops' Program for Social Reconstruction." Its author was Father John A. Ryan, professor of moral theology at the Catholic University of America, who especially by means of his writings on the ethical and economic aspects of the wage system had become the best known and most productive American representative of the social doctrine of Leo XIII. The Bishops' Program was to a great extent intended to counteract the socialist influence on the program for social reconstruction of the British Labour Party; it aimed at improving the conditions of the workers partly by voluntary collaboration in industry and partly by legal measures on the level of the individual states. It was a progressive document, evoking opposition; it proposed concrete reforms, like minimum wages, insurance against unemployment, sickness, and age. Some Catholics and others regarded such reforms as too radical and they were not established in law until the 1930s. In November 1919 the plenary meeting of the bishops published a comprehensive pastoral letter, which contained a section on industrial relations. With reference to Leo XIII they stressed the moral and intellectual aspect of the social question and its solution; they deplored unnecessary strikes, in regard to which only the claims of the mutually struggling parties were considered and the rights of the public were disregarded, and they recommended that a quarrel which could not be settled by discussions between the parties concerned should be submitted to arbitration. They stated that unions of workers or professionals were necessary, but "must be supplemented by societies or meetings which are composed of employers and employees," because they would maintain the common interests rather than the differing strivings of the two parties.

From 1920 the NCWC Department of Social Action was the chief agent for propagating the Church's social doctrine. It published some books and many praiseworthy brochures, it financed lectures in Catholic colleges and universities. In 1922 it founded the Catholic Conference on Industrial Problems, which up to 1940 held almost one hundred national and regional meetings in various places; for it had been proved that this was the most effective method to acquaint both non-Catholics and Catholics with the Church's position. The divisional director, Father Ryan, with his assistant, Father Raymond A. McGowan, developed a general program for industrial democracy, whereby the worker would be made an integrating element of this system. Pius XI's encyclical on the reconstruction of the social order, Quadragesimo anno, confirmed many of Ryan's proposals, especially the principle of the living wage, which should include the support of the worker's family.

With different stress, the American Catholics sought to apply the papal social teachings to the sufferings of their country during the Great Depression. Because Ryan based his economic analysis chiefly on the underconsumption theory of John A. Hobson, he was extremely critical of President Hoover's caution and cordially welcomed the policy of his successor. President Franklin D. Roosevelt invited Ryan to serve as policy adviser for the New Deal, and in 1934 he became a member of the industrial professional committee of the National Recovery Administration. He regarded as the climax of his life's work the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, the first law that prescribed a minimum wage and maximum weekly hours for the employees of firms which were involved in interstate commerce. But because Ryan trusted in the state as the only institution which could provide social justice, he was opposed by other Catholics, who feared that the centralizing of power in the federal government was dangerous for a religious minority and who were more uneasy than appeared to him to be justified by the threats from secularism, Communism, war, and the welfare state.

Finally, Ryan came into open conflict with the so-called Radio Priest, Charles E. Coughlin, pastor of the Shrine of the Little Flower at Royal Oak, Michigan. The latter had achieved national fame because at the beginning of the depression he had boldly attacked the abuses in the American economic system and offered remedies inspired by Rerum novarum and later by Quadragesimo anno. His ordinary, Bishop Michael James Gallagher of Detroit, encouraged him to propagate the social teachings of the papal encyclicals and remained his confidant, adviser, supporter, and defender until his death in 1937. Although Coughlin always stressed the right to private property, he found fault with the old industrial capitalism or plutocracy; he blamed the "international bankers," questioned the possibility of democracy because of the corrupt and self-seeking nature of politicians, supported extensive measures of the government for the economy, protection of the small business people and farmers, and a just wage for workers. In 1936 he founded the weekly newspaper, Social Justice, which within one year achieved a circulation of 1 million copies. Cardinal William O'Connell, archbishop of Boston, then publicly criticized Coughlin, even though never using his name, as a hysterical demagogue, and finally other Catholic bishops and priests, newspapers and periodicals, even Osservatore Romano, reprimanded him for intolerance of differences of opinion and for mixing in politics. His opponents accused him of seeking the creation of a Fascist dictatorship and mocked his financial proposals. In his extremely popular radio talks on Sunday afternoons he showed a growing disillusionment with American political institutions at the end of the 1930s and championed the establishing of a corporate state for bringing about social justice. In 1938 his newspaper proclaimed and demanded the organization of the Christian Front as a general alliance of Catholics and Protestants against Communism. He openly expressed his antipathy for Jews and suspected them of being Communists who had conspired for the destruction of Christian culture, but he rejected the inevitable reproach of anti-Semitism brought against him. Many Catholics were as ready as were Protestants likewise to regard Jewish "money changers" as responsible for the economic misery of the nation and the world. Cardinal George Mundelein, archbishop of Chicago, and other prominent Catholics from clergy and laity sought to keep the Church aloof from any incitement to racial prejudice and race hatred. Coughlin's newspaper appeared as the advocate of the Fascist regimes in Germany and Italy, because they opposed Communism, but he himself professed to be anti-Nazi. He preached nationalism, isolationism, and hatred of England when international tensions were deteriorating into armed conflict. At the end of 1940 he was put off the radio because both the national networks and the local stations declined to renew his contracts for broadcasting. In 1942 the government obtained the suspension of the newspaper Social Justice by the threat of a suit because of the crime of insurrection, allegedly begun with its opposition to the war. The new archbishop of Detroit, Edward Mooney, commanded Coughlin to discontinue all public statements. Nonpartisan judgments admitted that this priest was sincerely disturbed by the misery of the poor and the Communist danger and denied that he was a Fascist, but they conceded that he understood nothing about the economy and that the eclectic solutions which he proposed were ineffectual because of his all too simplistic, unsystematic, and confused analysis of the situation.

Many of the better educated and wealthy Catholics who took no pleasure from Coughlin's proposals founded the league of Social Justice on the national level in 1932 in order to study and apply the economic teachings of Pius XI. The director of this movement was Michael O'Shaughnessy, an oil manager and industrial publicist, who also published the Social Justice Bulletin as a monthly for timely events in this area. Although the league never counted more than 10,000 members, it seems to have exercised a widespread influence through the press and various Catholic organizations. It promoted a reform of the capitalist social order through control of the seeking of profit and by industry being forced to consider also the interests of the workers and the public as a whole.

Another search for a solution of the contemporary problems was undertaken by a group which aspired to alleviate the misery of individuals by direct contact and was not prepared to await clerical leadership or trust guidance by the hierarchy. Well known in this group was Dorothy Day, a recently converted journalist, who had previously been a radical activist and Communist. In 1932 she started the Catholic Worker Movement. She took up the idea of a Christian synthesis, as Peter Maurin, an itinerant social thinker from France, proclaimed it; he longed to repair, with the aid of an integral Catholicism, the unity of modern society shattered by secularism. The program advocated by him contained three points: (1) Round-table discussion by workers and intellectuals; (2) Friendship houses, in which Catholics could do justice to their personal responsibility toward the poor by doing works of mercy; (3) Farm communes, in which Catholic workers and students could learn to take care of themselves and build cells for a future Christian social order. Miss Day opened in Manhattan a House of Hospitality, which united the functions of a soup kitchen, a discussion club, and a reform center. Up to 1940 thirty such houses were erected in various cities. On 1 May 1933 she began the publication of the monthly Catholic Worker, which presented social doctrine in concrete guiding principles and in a brief time achieved a circulation of over 100,000. In order to supply an example for a really Catholic community and a model for the solution of the problem of unemployment, the Catholic Workers in 1936 established a farm commune in the neighborhood of Easton, Pennsylvania. It received great publicity but also harsh criticism as an example of romantic and utopian agrarianism. In addition to their assistance to the poor by their own voluntary poverty, by manual and intellectual work, and by the bestowing of personal attention, the Catholic Workers took part in strikes and demanded the forming of unions, although, according to their theory, they put little trust in unions or other centralized institutions. They sought by these practical methods to oppose Communist influences, to demonstrate Christian love, to inculcate spiritual values as a counterpole to materialism, and to promote personal sanctification. In addition, they fought anti-Semitism and discrimination against blacks. During the Spanish Civil War they came out for neutrality, and when the danger of America's involvement in World War II grew, many of them became pacifists and refused military service for reasons of conscience. These controversial positions caused internal decline and external repudiations. The strong emphasis on personalism prevented the Catholic Workers from solving the problems of society by an intelligent concept of the relation of the individual to the state and of his confidence in the capability of the government.

In 1937 a group of Catholic Workers, under the direction of John Cort, founded the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists in New York with the aim of making known to their members a knowledge of Catholic social teaching in order that these could then apply its principles in their own unions. Hence it advocated also the spread of the union system and supported justified strikes. It opened an evening school for workers, held training sessions, and published a newspaper, the Labor Leader. Other workers' schools, in which the students were instructed in practical subjects, such as public speaking, parliamentary procedure, and Communist tactics, were under the direction of diocesan officials, Jesuits, fraternities, and colleges. In this way more than 7,000 persons were annually prepared to reform and democratize their unions. The Catholics, who were represented in great numbers in the unions and in some even had an overwhelming majority, contributed to the ending of the Communist influence which had threatened the independence of the whole worker movement. When this aim was achieved in the postwar years, the workers' schools and the ACTU turned their efforts to removing other abuses in the unions, as, for example, gangster methods and the exploitation of members by unscrupulous bosses.

Not only the urban industrial workers and craftsmen but also the farmers constituted objects of special concern for the Church in the period between the two world wars. Edwin V. O'Hara had studied the problems of the rural population while he was still a priest of the archdiocese of Portland, Oregon; in 1920 he was invited to set up a bureau for agriculture in the NCWC Department of Social Action. He successfully proved the value of vacation schools for children, of religious correspondence courses for children and adults, and of associations. In 1923 he convened a meeting of Catholic agricultural leaders, at which the National Catholic Rural Life Conference was founded, and he was made its managing secretary. This society later counted thousands of laymen in its ranks, who were organized under diocesan directors and agricultural chairmen in some Catholic societies. In cooperation with the religious and secular organizations in the locality, they promoted committees for the development of communities, cooperative sales societies, credit unions, and educational institutions.

A further aspect of social justice which became consciously clearer to American Catholics in these years was the just treatment of members of the black race. Doctor Thomas W. Turner, a black Catholic teacher at the Hampton Institute in Virginia, in 1917 organized the Committee against the Extension of Race Prejudice in the Church, which made personal appeals to the bishops to do away with prejudice in churches, societies, schools, and seminaries. In order to enlarge the scope of this work there was founded in 1925 a militant organization called Federated Colored Catholics of the United States. In the first five years its leaders were exclusively black. The number of members claimed by them, more than 100,000, probably came from the affiliation of Catholic parishes and parish organizations. Interest in it grew among white clerics and lay persons, and in 1932 this change was reflected in the new title, then adopted, of National Catholic Federation for the Promotion of Better Race Relations.

However, the conscience of white Catholics was only gradually sharpened for the unhappy situation of blacks, and for a long time people were concerned only about local conditions. In 1927 Father John La Farge, S.J., founded the Catholic Laymen's Union, a group of blacks who were active in professional and business life. Seven years later the union convoked a mass meeting at New York, at which, with the approval of the archbishop, Cardinal Patrick Hayes, the first Catholic Interracial Council in the United States came into existence. In the succeeding thirty years more than sixty such associations were created in various places in the nation. Until 1962 Father La Farge was chaplain of the New York society and until 1960 his headquarters was a center of the movement for justice in race relations; he published the monthly Interracial Review, formed an exchange office for information, distributed educational materials, and performed advisory services for other societies. However, each society was autonomous, responsible only to the local ordinary, and each decided independently how to bring the influence of Catholic doctrine to bear in its special situation. The chief activity of the societies was of an educational sort. In second place was its aim of eliminating racial discrimination in Catholic churches, schools, hospitals, and other institutions and societies. Finally their efforts should be united with those of other organizations for racial equality and social actions and cooperate with these for the welfare of the community as a whole. In 1960 the Catholic Interracial Councils and similar organizations founded the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, with the aim of assisting the local societies and other Catholic institutions in the development of full-time professional staffs and in their programs; besides, they were to represent the societies on the national level. Their central office in Chicago became the office of exchange of information and a source for publications and technical capabilities. It held national meetings which were attended by their members in great numbers.

After World War II some bishops in the country caused a stir by their decisions in regard to the racial question in their respective dioceses. In 1947 Archbishop Joseph E. Ritter instructed his priests to end racial segregation in the schools of the archdiocese of Saint Louis with the beginning of the school year, and when irritated parents threatened to obtain a temporary court injunction against his orders, he warned them against this, because in accord with Catholic law they would automatically incur excommunication for impeding a bishop in the exercise of his pastoral duties. In 1948 the archbishop of Washington, Patrick A. O'Boyle, began the integration of white and black pupils in the Catholic schools of this archdiocese. In June 1953 Bishop Vincent J. Waters of Raleigh opened all Catholic churches, schools, hospitals, and other institutions in North Carolina to all, regardless of their color, and he did not yield before the severe opposition of some Catholics and non-

Catholics. All these courageous steps had been taken before the Supreme Court of the United States ended racial segregation in the public schools with its famed decision of 17 May 1954. Likewise in 1953 Archbishop Joseph F. Rummel excluded racial segregation also from the churches of the archdiocese of New Orleans after he had first achieved this in Catholic societies and associations. But not until 1962 did he venture to order the end of racial segregation also in the Catholic schools of his archdiocese, and even then he still encountered violent opposition from some lay persons.

Liturgical Movement

The Liturgical Movement was introduced into the United States chiefly by persons who were also interested in social action. The reformers of the liturgy sought to overcome individualism, which both in the Church and in secular society isolated people from one another, and so they aspired to make Catholics more keenly conscious of their membership and solidarity in the mystical body of Christ. The leading representative of this movement, Virgil Michel, a Benedictine monk of Saint John's Abbey, Collegeville, Minnesota, was also a prominent interpreter of the social encyclicals. He had undertaken extensive study journeys to Europe and there consulted the leaders and experts, especially Lambert Beauduin. Michel brought the ideas of liturgical renewal back to the United States and spread them in the monthly Orate Fratres, which first appeared in Advent 1926; in 1951 the title was changed to Worship. He also founded the Liturgical Press, which publishes texts, books, and brochures. The first liturgical "meeting" was held at Saint John's Abbey in 1929, and since 1940 a national Liturgical Week is held annually with the support of the Benedictine abbeys of the United States. The Benedictine Liturgical Conference, which formed the organ for implementing the annual "weeks," decided to reorganize on a broader basis, and in 1944 it was transformed into an association as the Liturgical Conference. In the 1950s its membership increased, because the liturgical reforms proceeding from Rome drew attention to its activity; this activity was widened to satisfy the requirements of dioceses and parishes. In addition to Michel, who died in 1938, Gerald Ellard, S.J., professor at Saint Mary's College in Kansas, was likewise a pioneer; with his books and periodical articles, in conection with his teaching and lecturing, he promoted the movement in the United States. For a while it encountered the opposition of some conservative prelates, but it gradually put itself across. Lay persons procured hand missals in English in ever larger numbers, and the Dialogue Mass spread more and more. Gregorian chant became better known, after the Pius X School of Liturgical Music, founded at Manhattanville College in 1916, had fostered it. Nonliturgical forms of devotion, like novenas, accordingly lost some of their popularity. Nevertheless, American Catholics were hardly prepared for the fundamental reforms which resulted from the Second Vatican Council.

The Situation in American Society

At least into the 1960s many fellow citizens regarded Catholics with secret distrust and open hostility. Anti-Catholicism was furthered, especially in the South, by periodicals such as Tom Watson's Magazine, published by the fanatical United States senator from Georgia, and The Menace, whose circulation reached its peak with 1.5 million in 1915. Even after Catholics had in World War I proved their undisputed loyalty, which was maliciously disputed by their enemies, they experienced in the early 1920s a new wave of attacks by the revived Ku Klux Klan, which also denounced and threatened Jews and blacks. The Klan expanded from the South to the Midwest and the far West, and at its peak counted 5 million members; but after 1925 it lost its reputation when the crimes and scandals of its leaders were exposed. When in 1928, for the first time in American history, the Democratic Party nominated a Catholic, Alfred E. Smith, governor of New York, as its presidential candidate, the anti-Catholic forces again stirred up religious hatred by attacking the candidate's Church and contributing to his defeat in the election. Catholics were not only effectively excluded from the highest office in the country, but between 1789 and 1933 only four Catholics held posts in the cabinets of the presidents.

For Catholics the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt signaled the beginning of a new era in American society. Al Smith had roused his fellow Catholics, especially in the big cities, to support the Democratic Party; Roosevelt obtained their devotion by the recognition which he gave them and the skillful treatment which he allotted to them. Many of the American bishops, including first of all Cardinal Mundelein, publicly proclaimed their approval of Roosevelt's policies, especially in the first terms of his administration. And the Catholic press took a generally positive attitude toward the New Deal. However, many Catholic leaders and newspapers deplored the president's decision to recognize the Soviet Union and to institute diplomatic relations with it, although they appreciated the efforts he made in the negotiations to secure guarantees of religious freedom. The Knights of Columbus and others also strongly criticized his silence and inaction in regard to the persecution of Catholics by the Mexican government. When Father Coughlin, who had supported Roosevelt at the beginning of his presidency, later attacked him both because of his economic policy, especially in regard to currency, credit, and banks, and also because of his alleged favoring of Communism, Monsignor John A. Ryan defended the president in 1936 in a national radio address. In the previous year Coughlin had founded the National Union for Social Justice, which was intended to act as a lobby of the people or as a civic-minded non-partisan force, to give emphasis to the demand for legal mooring of those reform principles which he extracted from the papal encyclicals and in keeping with this to work for the nomination and election of like-minded candidates to Congress in each party; it attained a membership of perhaps 5 million, especially among the workers of Irish and German descent in the East and Midwest, and it also achieved some of its goals. Later the radio priest created the Union Party and chose as its presidential candidate William Lemke, for whom he then conducted in 1936 an energetic but, as it finally turned out, useless election campaign.

Because of the well-known opposition of the Church to Communism, anti-Catholic propaganda declined during the Cold War. Nevertheless, some loud opponents continued to find public attention. The most notorious among them was Paul Blanshard, who directed his diatribes against the Church's authoritarian and antiliberal principles and accused the hierarchy of undermining American values and the ideals of freedom and democracy. He was the chief spokesman for an organization which had been founded in 1947 and called itself Protestants and Other Americans United for the Separation of Church and State, later Americans United for the Separation of Church and State. It worked with a great display of votes to prevent any public aid to parochial schools, which it designated as divisive and un-American; it also denied to any Catholic the ability to hold a public office. The nomination of another Catholic by the Democratic Party in 1960, John F. Kennedy, evoked a new outburst of antireligious feeling, and the candidate deemed it necessary to deny beforehand that the Church could exercise any influence at all on his official decisions. Political scientists have stated that many people who normally belonged to the Democratic Party voted against Kennedy because of his religion. After he had been elected by a very slender majority, he consistently resisted all proposals to support at least those parents who had to bear extra expenses so that they could send their children to Catholic schools. His electoral victory, his nonpartisan administration of his office, and his unusual popularity among all classes of the population lessened anti-Catholicism as a force in American society, and two years after his tragic death the declaration of the Second Vatican Council on religious liberty confirmed this effect still more; the American bishops had especially insisted on it.

When on 23 December 1939 President Roosevelt named Myron C.

Taylor, an Episcopalian, as his personal representative to Pope Pius XII with the rank of ambassador, an anti-Catholic outcry was raised. Taylor's job was to establish a connection between the two leading personalities in the promotion of peace and to coordinate the assistance of the Vatican and of the United States during and after the war. When Protestants protested strongly against the sending of an ambassador as a violation of the principle of the separation of state and Church, and demanded the ambassador's recall, Roosevelt insisted that this temporary mission did not involve the establishment of diplomatic relations. Although the opponents declared their opposition again at the end of the war, Taylor exercised his office until his recall in 1950. In October 1951 President Harry Truman nominated General Mark Clark as ambassador at the Vatican, but the Protestants raised such a storm of indignation that the president later withdrew the nomination at the general's request, before it was discussed in the Senate.

The Position of the Church in International Affairs

The unfriendly attitude of many of their fellow citizens did not deter the American Catholics from giving their opinion on international affairs. At the outbreak of World War I most writers in Catholic newspapers and periodicals advocated neutrality, and many, especially in the Midwest, even took the side of the Central Powers. Catholics of Irish birth or descent were of course against the British, and the German Catholic Centralverein pledged its total sympathy to Germany in 1914. Although a few bishops, such as Cardinal James Gibbons of Baltimore, praised President Woodrow Wilson for not intervening in the conflict in Europe, the majority of American Catholics opposed the foreign policy of the government, which favored the Allies, and, as it seems, the majority voted in the presidential election of 1916 for the Republican candidate. Some of the leading Catholics, however, admonished their coreligionists not to tread upon the sensitivities of other Americans by participating in German-American efforts for union or entering into partisan politics. But as soon as the United States had entered the war, a wave of patriotism drowned all pro-German inclinations.

After the war American Catholics generally opposed Wilson's peace policy, partly because he refused to work for the independence of Ireland. They brought forward many reasons against the anticipated entry of the United States into the League of Nations and, together with the majority of their fellow citizens, took refuge in isolationism. However, a few leaders, such as Father John A. Ryan, Judge Martin T. Manton, and Professor Carlton J. H. Hayes founded in 1927 the Catholic Association for International Peace for the instruction "of all men of good will on their obligation" to bring about world peace by justice and charity. The association championed many measures which were later realized, as, for example, for technical support and foreign aid. From Wilson's first administration to Roosevelt's second, American Catholics urged the government incessantly but vainly to intervene in Mexico in favor of the persecuted Catholics.

Even before World War II the American bishops at the request of the German hierarchy had supported all who had to flee from persecution by the Nazis by means of the Catholic Committee for Refugees and Refugee Children, founded by them. In 1940 they founded the Bishops' War Emergency and Relief Committee and took up a special collection in all churches for its support. The next year began the annual collections on Laetare Sunday for support of victims of war among the people of fifteen nations and among those who had sought refuge in various places in Europe and the Middle East. In 1942 the bishops established the War Relief Services, and in the next year this obtained the certificate for admission to the National War Fund, from which they obtained financial support until 1947. Meanwhile, the bishops continued the Laetare Sunday collections to obtain money for purely religious tasks, to which belonged special applications for aid from the Holy See and from numerous bishops and Catholic organizations abroad. In 1947 they expanded their annual appeal for donations in order to support the comprehensive program for help overseas, for rehabilitation, and for resettlement, which the War Relief Services had carried out. Even before the ending of hostilities the War Relief Services began their operations in the countries freed from the Axis Powers in Europe, Africa, and Asia. Shortly after the war's end there began also comprehensive aid programs in the hitherto hostile countries: Germany, Austria, Hungary, and Japan. But the assistance actions which were under way in Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, and Yugoslavia were forbidden by the Communist governments of these countries. Although the War Relief Services originally were to be only an institution for a limited time, it was later understood that they were permanently needed; and so in 1955 their name was changed to Catholic Relief Services of the NCWC. Because of their connections with local agencies and their expanding network of aid programs, the Catholic Relief Services were in the position of making full use of the surplus food which the American government in the 1950s destined for overseas assistance. In addition, they distributed clothing which Catholics had donated in the yearly collection at Thanksgiving. At the end of 1963 the Catholic Relief Services had shipped overseas food, clothing, medicines, and other means of help with a total weight of 5.6 million tons and a total value of $1.25 billion and had distributed these to needy persons and institutions. They helped more than 400,000 refugees settle in the United States or in other havens. They extended their field of activity to more than seventy countries, especially to the newly arising nations of Africa and the underdeveloped countries of Latin America, in which connection they promoted with greater emphasis than before technical aid, such as projects of self-help, which was intended to end social injustices, economic situations of dearth, sickness, and ignorance. In this way from the Catholic Relief Services came the greatest voluntary private organization for providing aid of the United States overseas.

American Catholics displayed their feeling of responsibility for other countries also by encouraging the foreign missions with personnel and money. Before World War I only a few Americans had gone abroad to proclaim the message of faith. Although the first religious congregation which was established in the United States for this purpose, namely, the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America, usually called Maryknoll Missioners, founded by James A. Walsh and Thomas F. Price, had been approved by the American bishops and allowed, as an experiment, by Pius X as early as 1911, the first group of missioners under Price's leadership and with South China as goal, did not leave until 1918. In the postwar years many other religious institutes, especially the Society of Jesus, also sent men and women to the foreign missions. In 1958 Cardinal Richard Cushing, archbishop of Boston, founded the Missionary Society of Saint James the Apostle for the restoring and preserving of the faith in Latin America; it was to consist of diocesan priests, who voluntarily obliged themselves for five years, and they were to develop among the poor a life in the parish community. Within five years there were ninety-three members from nineteen different dioceses in English-speaking countries. Earlier, in 1950, the Grail, an international lay movement of Catholic women, had begun a regular course of training for the missionary apostolate of the laity. A lay organization for men and women was approved under the title of Papal Volunteers for Latin America. Within three years 245 papal volunteers served without pay, usually for a period of three years, in twelve countries; they were invited by the local bishops and were active predominantly in the area of education, medicine, and social work.

In 1966 9,303 American priests, brothers, sisters, and men and women from the lay state worked in many countries of America, Asia, and Latin America. American Catholics supplied donations to the missionary institutes and the papal work for the propagation of the faith; in 1919 the total sum for this already amounted to more than $1 million per year, and in 1966 alone the sum for the papal work was approximately $16 million.

Lay Movements

In the decades following World War I laymen began to display a greater activity in the Church. The National Council of Catholic Men and the National Council of Catholic Women were established under the National Catholic Welfare Conference in 1920 as a merger of parochial, supraparochial, diocesan, individual state, and national organizations. By 1965 about 10,000 organizations with a total membership of about 9 million joined the National Council of Catholic Men, and 14,000 organizations with almost 10 million members the National Council of Catholic Women. Both parent organizations created a broadly conceived program for spirituality, information, civic and social action, family life, youth, and international affairs. They provided aid to the affiliated organizations in the planning and implementation of local programs. Of course, in most places they operated by means of diocesan societies of Catholic men and women. The national associations represented the Catholic laity in other national and international organizations and at meetings of both a religious and a secular sort, and also in committees of Congress. To the men's council was given the responsibility for all Catholic radio and television programs, which were regularly broadcast on the national networks. The best known program was the "Catholic Hour," which was broadcast from 1930 by the National Broadcasting Company. In 1971 the two associations united as the National Council of Catholic Laity.

Two specialized lay movements acquired national importance. The Cana Conference began as a series of retreats which Father John P. Delaney, S.J., conducted in Saint Louis in 1944. Such meetings, which were more unstructured and relaxed than spiritual exercises in the strict sense, were intended to apply religious principles to the secular aspects of married life in a manner which was sensible to twentieth-century Americans. These meetings instilled community sense and led to the forming of Cana Clubs for regular study and prayer in the homes of participants together with a chaplain. A further result was participation in the social apostolate to a greater extent. In most dioceses directors of family life were appointed, and thousands of priests and lay persons were gained for the implementing and spreading of this movement. In addition, numerous Pre-Cana Conferences for engaged couples spread, and for widowed persons Naim Conferences, also called Post-Cana Clubs, were formed. The Bethany Conference was a further extension for single persons.

A similar function was performed by the Christian Family Movement, which had begun in Chicago as a Catholic Action group for men and in 1947 was transformed into an organization for married couples by Mr.

and Mrs. Patrick Crowley. The basic units consisted of from five to six couples, usually from the same parish, who met in their homes and carried out a program for discussions and actions in the area of the lay apostolate. These units rapidly increased; by 1963 more than 40,000 couples actively took part in the group meetings that occurred every two weeks in the United States and Canada; in other countries there was probably an equally large number. In 1949 a national coordinating committee with headquarters in Chicago was set up to exchange ideas and reports of experiences with the help of some publications and annual programs. The members of every group were to examine from time to time a special aspect of family, cultural, political, economic, or international life, come to a judgment on whether it was entirely humane and Christian, and then decide possible actions, which were to be undertaken by the couples, either individually or collectively. Most participants, however, were chiefly interested in family problems, as, for example, the rapidly increasing national divorce rate.

Other organizations of Catholic Action which had begun in the United States after World War II were the Young Christian Workers and the Young Christian Students, which had been founded on the European model. In the same period the Exercises Movement led to a deepening of the spiritual life of the laity in the midst of secular professional activity. Catholic professional societies likewise prospered.

Journalism

After World War I the Catholic press underwent a noteworthy development. The ownership of most newspapers was transferred by lay persons to the dioceses. But even then, when a diocesan weekly newspaper was designated as "official organ" or "the voice" of the local authorities, a distinction was made between authoritative views of the Church and the opinions of the publisher. There now also appeared Catholic newspaper chains. In 1929 the newspaper Catholic Register, which had begun five years earlier with the publication of a national edition, published at Denver under the direction of Monsignor Matthew J. W. Smith its first edition for another diocese, and within nine years this system increased to nineteen editions, with a circulation of 400,000; in 1964 it had thirty-three editions with a total circulation of 778,196. The paper Our Sunday Visitor, which had been founded in 1912 by Father, later Bishop, John Francis Noll of Fort Wayne, Indiana, chiefly for apologetic purposes as a reaction to anti-Catholic and pro-Socialist newspapers, began in 1937 the publication of an edition for another diocese; in 1964 it produced eleven diocesan editions, a Canadian national edition, and a national news edition, with a total circulation of 892,148. Other chains of smaller size were formed in Ohio and Wisconsin. In 1969 there were eighty-nine locally published diocesan papers with a total circulation of 4,229,065.

The first larger Catholic daily newspaper in English in the United States was the Tribune, founded in 1920 at Dubuque, Iowa, by Nicholas E. Gonner, and two years later moved to Milwaukee, Wisconsin. It was strongly apologetic in tone. After Gonner's death the book publisher William George Bruce bought it along with others and continued it until 1942. Another Catholic daily, the Sun Herald, was started in 1950 at Kansas City, Missouri, by a group of Catholic laymen under the leadership of Robert Hoyt, but the next year it was stopped because of insufficient subscriptions. A few of this lay group in 1964 began the National Catholic Reporter. This weekly became very familiar among liberal Catholics, because it gave religious news without restrictions and critically interpreted it; it even incurred censure from the bishop of Kansas City, but this was ineffective.

In order to supply Catholic newspapers with news on national and international affairs the NCWC News Service was established in 1920; it took over the work of a smaller agency which had previously been operated by the Catholic Press Association of the United States and Canada. It erected an overseas service, hired correspondents in almost every part of the world, obtained subscriptions in sixty-five countries, and finally supplied services for leading articles, pictures, radio, and eventually also for television and some other services. The Catholic Press Association, founded in 1911, also held annual meetings, published a monthly and a historical "annual," and promoted the increase of circulation and the advertising business; it likewise especially supported the Catholic press in Latin America and the mission press in general.

Catholic newspapers in foreign languages appeared and again disappeared during this period. Among German publications some continued even after World War I, such as the important daily Amerika at Saint Louis, which ended in 1924. In 1936 there still were twenty-three German-language Catholic papers, but in World War II they all stopped or changed over to English, as did The Wanderer of Saint Paul. Of the ten papers in Polish which existed in 1940, all suspended appearance in the succeeding years except for the Dziennik Chicagoski (Polish Daily News), which the Resurrectionists had founded in 1890 and which also supplied local, national, and international news. Also two Italian weeklies, La Voce del Popolo, founded at Detroit in 1910 and Il Crociato, founded in 1933 by the diocese of Brooklyn, continued to appear after World War II. Newspapers in Spanish and in a few Slavonic languages in addition to Polish were also published under Catholic patronage. In 1964 there were altogether thirteen foreign-language papers with a total circulation of 195,434.

Among Catholic magazines those prospered which were concerned with the home and foreign missions. Extension, the organ of the Catholic Church Extension Society (founded in 1906), in 1963 provided 400,000 readers every month not only with news on the mission work fostered by the society in the United States, but also articles of general interest. The first magazine which promoted the foreign missions exclusively was published by the Maryknoll Missioners, first under the title Field Afar and later Maryknoll. In the 1960s it increased its circulation to more than 300,000.

Magazines which had been founded before World War I continued to exist side by side. The organ of the Third Order of Saint Francis, St. Anthony Messenger, had begun in 1893 and became a popular family magazine, which in 1960 had a circulation of 330,000. The oldest Catholic newspapers which appeared at this time were the Catholic World of the Paulists, in which the effort was made to bring the faith into relation with American society, and Ave Maria of the Congregation of the Holy Cross, which aspired to form family life in a Christian way. Other magazines published by religious institutes with a broad circulation were: the Messenger of the Sacred Heart (1886, by Jesuits), the Liguorian (1913, by Redemptorists), the Sign (1921, by Passionists), and the Voice of St. Jude (1913), later called the U.S. Catholic (by Claretians). The two most important opinion-forming weeklies were America, begun in 1909 and published by Jesuits, and Commonweal, begun in 1924 and published by lay persons, both of which sought to treat contemporary problems and cultural themes from a Catholic standpoint. The Catholic Digest had a circulation of 650,000 in 1964. In the same year there were published fifty-nine consumer magazines with a total circulation of 7,042,996, fifty business and professional magazines with a circulation of 455,931, 241 magazines which accepted no advertisements with a total circulation of 12,934,017, and twenty-four foreign-language magazines with a total circulation of 228,988, under Catholic patronage. In the next five years these numbers quickly dropped. Nevertheless, the total circulation of the Catholic press in the United States in 1969 amounted to 25,599,766.

By 1964 journalism was offered as an academic course in one form or another in about half the Catholic universities and colleges in the United States. The only College of Journalism was founded in 1915 at Marquette University in Milwaukee, but graduate study in the mass media was later likewise instituted in other Catholic institutions. In recent years ever more courses in radio and television were offered. In the academic programs both technical courses in theory and practice of the various communications media were contained, as well as theoretical courses on their role in society and their professional ethics.

Statistics prove that the connection of Catholics with their Church dropped considerably before 1968, when Pope Paul VI issued the encyclical Humanae Vitae. A famous sociologist of religion refers the decline of traditional forms of church practice, for example, attendance at Sunday Mass, to the strong repudiation on the part of many of the faithful to the teaching contained in this papal document on birth control. Other analysts are of the view that rather a whole complex of various factors played a role: the growing secularism, an exaggrated personalism, thorough permissiveness, libertinism, and antinomianism, an anti-"Establishment" attitude and religious indifferentism, as has been characteristic of the manner of thought in the United States and in many other countries of the free world since the beginning of the 1960s. The loss of respect for Pope and bishops is due to the fact that certain theologians publicly and at times loudly held themselves aloof from declarations of the magisterium. The most important Protestant Churches in the United States experienced a similar downward trend; only the smaller fundamentalist and Pentecostal sects, which appealed to special revelations or made lofty demands on their adherents, have grown disproportionately. Although the teachings and reforms of the Second Vatican Council were generally greeted by American Catholics, the hope and expectation of a new flowering of the Church in the United States have not been realized in the postconciliar period.

CANADA

Population

Between 1911 and 1961 Canada's total population rose from 7,206,643 to 18,238,247 inhabitants. In this period the number of Catholics increased from 2,841,881—39.4 percent—to 8,342,826—45.7 percent. However, Catholics were not uniformly distributed: 56 percent lived in the province of Quebec. When in 1951 Catholics constituted 44.7 percent of the Canadian total population, they were divided among the individual provinces according to the following percentages: 88.0 in Quebec, 50.6 in New Brunswick, 45.5 in Prince Edward Island, 40.6 in the Northwest Territory, 34.0 in Nova Scotia, 33.6 in Newfoundland, 28.5 in Saskatchewan, 28.3 in Manitoba, 25.7 in Ontario, 23.8 in Alberta, 20.9 in the Yukon, and 15.0 in British Columbia. In the same year the Catholic population, according to nationalities, was distributed thus: 66.7 percent French, 7.9 Irish, 5.9 English, 3.5 Ukrainian, 2.9 Scottish, 2.6 Polish, 2.5 German, 2.2 Italian, 1.4 native

Indian, and 4.4 other. The percentage of Catholics within each individual nationality amounted to 96.7 of the French, 34.5 of the Irish, 10.2 of the English, 56 of the Ukrainians, 11.8 of the Scots, 74.8 of the Poles, 24.7 of the Germans, 89.6 of the Italians, and 53.5 of the native Indians.

Organization

In 1914 there were ten archdioceses, twenty-five dioceses, five vicariates apostolic, one Ruthenian bishop, and one prefecture apostolic. Fifty years later there were fifteen archdioceses of the Latin Rite—fourteen provinces plus Winnipeg—one province of the Ukrainian Byzantine Rite, forty dioceses, one abbey nullius, three eparchies, and eight vicariates apostolic.

Educational System

In each province the Catholic elementary and secondary schools stood in one or another relationship to the secular authorities. In the province of Quebec the schools were regarded as public institutions and were supported by general taxes, but supervised by Catholic and Protestant committees of the Council of Public Instruction. Hence the two systems developed pretty much in independence of each other: The Catholic system followed the French tradition in education, and the Protestant followed the English. Private or independent schools played a more important role in Quebec than in other provinces. The most important were the classical colleges; they offered an eight-year course which one entered upon completing elementary school and which led in two stages of four years each to the bachelor's degree. In 1965 there were thirty-two classical colleges for men and nine for women, which were affiliated to Laval University, and twenty-seven colleges for men and six for women, which were associated with Montreal University.

Newfoundland also had a system of provincial denominational schools. Here the five large denominations operated their own schools under the supervision of a school superintendent, who was responsible to the deputy minister of education of the province. All schools followed the same curriculum.

In Ontario, Saskatchewan, and Alberta the first school which was erected with the support of taxes in one community had always to be a provincial school, open to all children. But the school law allowed Catholic or Protestant minorities to withdraw from the provincial school system and establish their own school-sponsoring bodies and schools, which were termed "separate" schools. The local inhabitants could choose which system they wanted to support with their taxes, and usually they made their choice according to their religion. Both the provincial and the separate schools were subject to the jurisdiction of the provincial Department of Education and both obtained provincial aid. In Saskatchewan and Alberta separate Catholic schools could be erected only in the large cities where Catholics were represented in sufficient number. In Ontario separate schools could offer only the eight elementary and two lower secondary grades; hence Catholics had to erect private schools for the three higher secondary grades.

The provinces on the Atlantic coast—New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island—and Manitoba in accord with the law maintained only provincial schools, but on the basis of a "Gentlemen's Agreement" there were, within the provincial school system in areas where there were many English and French Catholics, also English-language and French-language Catholic schools. Outside the French-language areas of Manitoba, for example, Saint Boniface, the Catholics had also to finance at their own expense their private or parochial schools, in addition to the taxes which they had to pay for the support of the provincial schools.

British Columbia likewise provided only a provincial system, and such schools could under no circumstances be denominational; hence Catholics were forced to support their own schools in addition to the provincial schools. In the Yukon and Northwest, thanks to the collaboration of dominion and local authorities with the denominational bodies, systems had been developed in which Catholic elementary schools for the sparse population of Indians, Eskimos, and whites obtained full support through taxes from the government and the local authorities.

In 1962 nineteen Catholic colleges and universities were authorized to grant academic degrees. They had almost 25,000 students, and another 10,000 attended the colleges affiliated to them, predominantly in Quebec. The total number of 35,000 made up about 30 percent of all the students who were registered in Canadian colleges and universities.

All these institutions were in the east, but they differed considerably in size and capacity. In the coastal provinces there were nine, the largest of which was Saint Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, Nova Scotia, which was under the patronage of the diocese and acquired an international reputation for its research on cooperatives and its adult education. In the province of Quebec, Montreal University, which had been attached for forty years to Laval University in Quebec City, became an independent institution by a document of the provincial government in 1920. In 1954 the University of Sherbrooke obtained a similar charter. In Ontario the University of Ottawa, the first bilingual Canadian university, was run by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate. Saint Michael's College, directed by the Basilian Fathers, was united with the University of Toronto; it was the first Catholic college of the humanities which agreed to an arrangement whereby it maintained a certain degree of independence but granted its degrees through the university. Assumption University at Windsor, also conducted by the Basilians, likewise became independent in 1953, but ten years later decided to stop granting academic degrees, except in theology, so that it could merge with the new nondenominational University of Windsor. The Laurentian University of Sudbury, which was founded as such in 1960, had been earlier, since 1913, a college run by the Jesuits, and was formally united with Huntington University, an institution of the United Church of Christ.

In western Canada there were no independent Catholic colleges or universities, because the legislators refused to grant to each province more than one academic degree-granting institution. But the Basilians and Jesuits founded colleges, which were united with the provincial universities in various ways or were affiliated to them. Thus, in the sphere of higher education these two orders experimented with new forms of merger with non-Catholic universities for the sake of the academic and economic advantages which they sought thereby.

Social Movement

Various sources gave the theoretical impulse for the Canadian Catholic social movement. In addition to the papal encyclicals, the pastoral letters of the bishops also treated social questions, in which connection they passed from the problems predominantly connected with agriculture and rural life at the beginning of the twentieth century to problems of industrialization and the working class in the later decades. In 1950 the archbishops and bishops of the civil province of Quebec issued a common pastoral letter entitled "The Workers' Problem in the Light of the Church's Social Doctrine," in which they took a bold stand on some points, as, for example, in regard to the codetermination of the worker in the direction of an industry. Two private institutions provided further theoretical fuel: the École Sociale Populaire, founded in 1911, promoted social studies, issued publications, and from 1920 supported the annual Semaines Sociales du Canada, which brought together leading personalities of social doctrine and of social action in order to consult together on common concerns. And the École des Sciences Sociales of Laval University, founded in 1932, made noteworthy contributions.

The workers' union (local syndicates), organized on a formally Catholic basis by priests and laymen in various parts of the province of Quebec, merged in 1921 with the Confédération des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada. At first non-Catholics could be members but not hold office. This restriction was gradually ended. Likewise, every union had a chaplain, a Catholic priest, who at first was authorized to inform the bishops of every decision which, in his opinion, was contrary to Catholic social doctrine; in practice, the chaplains rarely exercised this right and finally became merely moral advisers, who attended all meetings and could present their views but had no vote. In its original constitution the confédération expressly declared its loyalty to the social doctrine of the Catholic Church, but in 1960 the denominational ties were broken; the expression "Christian principles" was put in their place, and the name was changed to Confédération des Syndicats Nationaux. From the late 1930s the Catholic syndicates had about one-third of all members of unions of the province of Quebec in their ranks; the others belonged mainly to international (American) unions. However, the confédération exercised on the worker movement as a whole and on worker legislation an influence which was in no proportion to its size and persumably was based on its social and ideological concerns.

An expressly Catholic movement was also started for workers in agriculture. In 1924 2,400 farmers meeting in Quebec city founded the Union Catholique des Cultivateurs. This organization defended and fostered the general interests of the rural population, especially in regard to the educational system. In the 1950s it also established rural syndicates in order to deal collectively with the buyers of farm products. In 1965 there were almost 700 local syndicates with more than 50,000 members as opposed to a possible membership of 65,000 to 70,000. As in the workers' syndicates, the role of the chaplain developed from that of a participant exercising power to that of a moral adviser or attorney, but the word "Catholic" was not removed from the organization's name.

For Catholic manufacturers and employers there was no permanent organization until the Association Professionnelle des Industriels was founded in 1943. It was intended to protect the interests of management and promote a Christian social order. In 1965 it numbered ca. 500 members, who for the most part belonged to small or medium firms. Despite its limitation it played a leading role and, it is true, by cooperation with other groups, in which regard it directed the attention of management to the working class and to the human problems in business life. It was also an active member of the Union Internationale Chrétienne des Dirigeants d'Entreprise.

CHAPTER 24

*The Church in Latin America

In Latin America lives about one-third of the world's Catholic population, but its internal strength does not correspond to its statistical strength. The causes go back partly to the colonial period, others were added from the time of emancipation at the beginning of the nineteenth century and have grown still stronger. The structure of the population was decided by the political-economic domination of the former colonial masters, the Spaniards and Portuguese, who did not, it is true, like the white immigrants to North America, decimate the original inhabitants—the Indians—or force them into reservations; however, the Christian mission did not succeed in overcoming pagan magic and the corresponding morality among them. The immigration from Europe, especially to Argentina and Brazil, strengthened the white element, whose interbreeding with Indians and the black slaves brought from Africa produced a third unstable element of mestizos and mulattoes respectively.

The biggest problem confronting the Church was the unequal distribution of landed property. The white upper class in large-scale operations cultivated the greatest part of the productive acreage available and kept the peasants in extreme poverty. Similar social tensions existed in the mines, for example, in Bolivia, and in the industrial areas of rapidly growing vast cities, such as São Paulo and Buenos Aires, with high unemployment and slums. The market difficulties of the raw materials countries as a consequence of the world economic crisis promoted the pauperization of the masses.

The Church's proclamation in preaching and catechetics was in many places insufficient, the native clergy was partly inactive and strongly authoritarian. In this way is explained the fact that in almost all countries of Latin America groups of priests were formed who aspired to alter the social structures by nationalization of the means of production and the establishment of Marxism, if necessary by force; in this way the Church would fulfill its true mandate. The episcopate, whom the progressive priest groups more or less correctly charged with supporting the "exploiters," warned against revolution with changing success, but did not from the outset repudiate the socialist experiment of Allende in Chile, though on the other hand it held itself aloof from autocratic regimes, as in Paraguay.

---

* Félix Zubillaga, S.J.

An indication of the internal weakness of the Latin American Church, and at the same time a contributing cause of the crisis in which it exists, is the lack of native priests and religious, which could be lessened, but not eliminated, by immigration from abroad, especially from Europe—for example, in Bolivia, where there is one priest for 17,000 faithful. Also important, though not yet more important, would be the improvement of the theological and spiritual formation of future priests, for which the Adveniat program of the German Catholics hopes to offer help.

The situation of the Church of Latin America was a constant concern of the Popes. Benedict XV strengthened the position of the nuncios, who up to then had been partly Delegati Apostolici ed Inviati straordinari, by the decree of 8 May 1916, which stated that these should rank as permanent representatives of the Holy See—Internuntii Apostolici. Pius XI improved the diocesan division in almost all countries of Latin America: in Venezuela in 1922–23, in Bolivia in 1924, in Paraguay in 1929, in Colombia and Argentina in 1934, but especially in Brazil, so that "no country in the world, except China, even only approximately experienced so great an increase of its ecclesiastical circumscriptions," as Schmidlin says.

The Latin American episcopate met in connection with the Thirty-Sixth International Eucharistic Congress at Rio de Janeiro from 25 July to 4 August 1955 and established the Latin American Episcopal Conference—Consejo Episcopal Latino-Americano (CELAM), which was confirmed by Pius XII on 2 November 1955. The first annual meeting at Bogotá in 1956 enacted its statutes. CELAM supports a permanent secretariat and publishes a monthly Boletín Informativo.

The Conference of Medellín from 26 August to 7 September 1968, organized following the Eucharistic Congress of Bogotá and opened by Pope Paul VI, in which 155 bishops and 137 representatives of the priests, sisters, and laity took part, strove for a change in the pastoral and social work of the Church and its uniformity. Cardinal Samorè and the archbishops of Lima and Teresina held the chairmanship as representatives of the Pope. The consultations were based on a "Basic Document" composed by CELAM. The conference stated that in Latin America there existed a "situation of institutionalized power," which justifies a legitimate defense but not a revolutionary uprising. The Church wants to be a "ferment" in the structural changes that are to be quickly sought. Economic, social, and agrarian reform, an educación liberadora, are indispensable. Pastoral care must take an interest in the intellectual leadership classes, promote a Christian family policy—up to 40 percent of men over fifteen years old live in uniones libres—catechesis must be oriented to social change, and for this purpose the establishment of a catechetical periodical Catequesis Latinoamericana with headquarters at Asunción was decreed. It was impressed on the diocesan and religious clergy that, in view of the deep poverty of wide strata, it must itself "live poverty." Following the Conference of Medellín the national episcopates in many pastoral letters set up guidelines for pastoral work and undertook organizational measures.

The ecclesiastical situation in the individual countries of Latin America has developed in such diversity, not least as a consequence of frequent changes of the forms of government and of the governments, that our presentation must be arranged according to countries.

BRAZIL

Brazil has a total area of 8,511,965 square kilometers and in 1976 had 104 million inhabitants; in 1971 89.3 percent were Catholics. About 60 percent are whites, the rest blacks, mulattoes, and other half-castes, only ca. 2 percent are Indians.

Ecclesiastical Organization

In 1957 there were: twenty archdioceses, seventy-seven dioceses, thirty-one prelacies, and one abbey nullius, and 3,722 parishes, two-thirds of which were staffed by diocesan priests, one-third by religious, and in which some 30,000 sisters worked.

In 1939 the bishops held a plenary council; since 26 October 1945 there has been an Episcopal Conference (CNBB), which was approved by Pius XII. To it belong the residential bishops of all rites, the coadjutors, auxiliaries, and bishops charged with a special function, and all bishops who have their ecclesiastical residence in Brazil. The functions of the Episcopal Conference include the fostering of cooperation with other episcopal conferences and of contact with the state in concert with the nunciature. Since 1891 there has been separation of church and state; it was abolished in 1934 but reintroduced in 1946.

Lack of Priests

In his letter of 18 December 1910 Pope Pius X wrote: "We are convinced that, in accord with the desires of the Holy See, you will constitute a clergy which will be redemption and light of the world; the laity trained for this will participate in its tasks."[1] Even then the lack of priests was the most serious problem of the Church in Brazil. Pius X wrote to the Brazilian bishops on 6 June 1911: "You must undertake all efforts so that sufficient priests will be at the disposal of the faithful."[2]

[1] BIB, 106.

[2] Ibid., 106f.

Nevertheless, Pius XI, after the visit of three apostolic delegates, had to state in his letter of 20 January 1927: "Everywhere too few priests, in some areas none at all, hence restricted in their services to the faithful, although religious brothers and sisters from Europe offer great support. It is to be deplored that so few vocations come from the young, and even then these cannot realize their desires because no means are available and the seminaries are insufficient."[3]

Catholic Action

A great help for the promotion of Catholic Action in Brazil was the letter of Pope Pius XI of 12 October 1935 to Cardinal Sebastião Leme and the bishops, in which he presents Catholic Action as a work of divine Providence for the faithful who are ready to work still more closely with the shepherds; the bishops and priests for their part can, with this assistance, exercise their functions on a still broader basis, which is of great importance considering the small number of priests in Brazil.[4] In a letter of 21 January 1942 to Cardinal Leme Pius XII expressed his thanks and his joy that the Brazilian Marianists "are capable coworkers in the spreading of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ and that they are accomplishing a vast apostolate by many works"; he also desired "that these groups might grow and become stronger from day to day and furthermore work with their usual obedience for the spreading of God's Kingdom, preach in the families and in society, always in harmony with traditional truths and Catholic principles, which do not change but remain constant for all times."[5] In accord with the wishes of Pius XI the Brazilian episcopate on 9 June 1935 published a document, accompanied by announcements for every diocese, on the statutes of Brazilian Catholic Action, examined and provided with the Pope's blessing.[6]

Piety

The Brazilian level of piety was, apart from particular variations, relatively high in 1965. Inquiries which were conducted in the archdiocese of Ribeirão Prêto, a traditional area with a slow growth of the urban population, for example, in Patrocínio Paulista, a place of ca. 3,000 inhabitants, which in the last years listed an increase of 1,200 inhabitants, yielded a result of 52 percent Sunday churchgoers. Other areas with a more rapid increase of the urban population, such as Sertãozinho, Jardinópolis, and Ribeirão Prêto, yielded only 22 percent,

---

[3] Ibid., 108.

[4] Ibid., 108f.

[5] Ibid., 109f.

[6] Ibid., 90.

24 percent, and 18 percent. This piety, which is present in the interior of Brazil and especially in the underdeveloped areas in the north and northwest, and even in cities such as Salvador, Rio de Janeiro, São Paulo, Belo Horizonte, and Recife, attests to a Christian vitality, although in some points it needs examination; it must still grow into the renewal of the Second Vatican Council.[7]

Too Few Priestly Vocations

The Brazilian Church has too few priestly vocations for its pastoral tasks. Without intending to go into the deeper reasons for this fact, the following statistics show it: in 1962 there were 922 diocesan seminarians and 1,772 seminarians for religious institutes; in 1968 there were only 870 and 1,665. This loss in vocations has a still greater significance, if it is considered that in 1962 Brazil had 79.096 million inhabitants and in 1968 89.37 million. If these numbers are compared it can be seen that in 1962 there was one seminarian for every 27,504 inhabitants, in 1968 one for every 35,257. The assistance of foreign clergy has decreased in recent years. In 1967 98 diocesan priests and 265 religious priests came to the country, a year later there were only 64 and 184 respectively.[8]

Without a doubt this lack of priests has effects on piety. Thus a census of 1962 and 1963 shows that 50 million Catholics, or 70 percent, do not attend Sunday Mass. At São Paulo it was 3.5 million. In other cities the proportions were similar. On the other hand, according to a study of the Brazilian Institute for Public Opinion and Statistics (IBOPE) at São Paulo, the inclination to secularization is powerful: at São Paulo alone in 1962–63 a half million television sets were installed; the broadcasts reached 3 million viewers. In the capital of the state of São Paulo there are today seventeen radio stations, five television stations, and two more programs will soon begin their operation; also, eighteen daily newspapers, some of them with a circulation of ca. 200,000 copies; almost 250 movie houses; and dozens of periodicals. Other cities and states of Brazil offer the same picture; in this way public opinion is formed, canalized, and dominated by financially powerful press concerns. The Brazilian Church tried to construct a front against this powerful propaganda, although many state broadcasting stations beam programs of a religious character. In 1972 the Church had 199 radio transmitters, including A Aparecida, a station with considerable range; 152 periodicals with a large circulation; three television stations—in Rio de Janeiro, Brasilia, and Pôrto Alegre—which since March 1972 have broadcast programs in color.

---

[7] Cf. A. Rolim, O.P., "Em tôrno da Religiosidade no Brasil," REB 25 (1965), 11–27.

[8] Cf. A. Gregory, "Anteprojecto de pesquisa sôbre as causas do Excasseamento de Vocações Sacerdotais," REB 31 (1971), 389–93.

Brazil has need of 60,000 priests—this number is determined by the national Secretariat of Priestly Vocations; but only ca. 350 priests are educated in a year. With this quota the desired number would be achieved in 200 years, but by then Brazil would have ca. 400 million inhabitants.[9]

Care of Souls

The fifth plenary meeting of the Episcopal Conference published after its discussions of 2 to 5 April 1962 the following declaration: The 135 participants are aware of the desires and hopes of the 166 ecclesiastical spheres of jurisdiction, the 12,000 priests of the nation, and all members of religious institutes, seminarians, collaborators in the lay apostolate, and the faithful in the 4,500 Brazilian parishes. They state that the Episcopal Conference achieved its goals and that the pastoral activity of the bishops produces better results in the nation. The regular meetings, the exchange of experiences, the common planning and cooperation bring it about that ever broader areas of the country profit from the methods employed. Thus there are, for example, today greater possibilities of solving the problems of priestly vocations, training catechists, and making preparations for programs and projects. The impact of caritas grows in importance, and also the solving of the social tasks of the Church, especially in the field of education and of agricultural associations. Likewise the enlightenment of public opinion on important questions of the family, education, and the Church's social doctrine; special organizations with the goal of strengthening the presence of the Church; exchange of opinion and cooperation with other episcopates; aid from priests from other countries or money donations from foreign Catholics for Brazilian works; the organization of the lay apostolate.[10]

The result of the common pastoral care was, for example, the mobilization of the diocese of Bajé for catechesis in 1962. Similar initiatives were begun in many other dioceses under the motto "Without catechism, no religion." This action extended to all public schools which hitherto had had to get along without religious instruction. A central team of religious brothers, sisters, and professors undertook to develop an educational plan for teachers of religion and to organize religious instruction. The program was submitted at a meeting of the clergy; also the method was explained according to which religious instruction should be given, and many suggestions for modifications were incorporated. The program was sent to all teachers. The committee sessions yielded the following guidelines: elaboration of a general plan for instruction in the public schools; training of catechists in every diocese; forming of a department for religious education; a list of consultants for state and communal schools; catechetical centers in the parishes; intensive courses; provision of aid for high schools; encyclicals to the parishes.[11]

---

[9] Cf. Fr. P. A. de Assis, O.F.M., in REB 23 (1963), 433–35.

[10] REB 20 (1960), 485–90.

A comprehensive and systematic program worked out for pastoral care went into effect within the Brazilian Church for the years 1966–70.[12] The thirty-two ecclesiastical provinces of Brazil have been since 1970 under four cardinals and 272 archbishops and bishops. Their work is divided among the following regions: North Region I: states of Amazonas, Acre, Mato Grosso, and parts of the territories of Roraima and Rondônia; total area 2,215,099 square kilometers, 1,299,829 inhabitants (.58 inhabitant per square kilometer), 86 parishes (15,114 inhabitants per parish), 237 priests (3,484 inhabitants per priest). North Region II: state of Pará and territory of Amapá; total area 1,366,598 square kilometers, 2,222,142 inhabitants (1.63 inhabitants per square kilometer), 119 parishes (18,673 inhabitants per parish), 290 priests (7,662 inhabitants per priest). Northeast Region I: states of Maranhão, Piauí, and Ceará; total area 722,917 square kilometers, 8,923,154 inhabitants (12.35 inhabitants per square kilometer), 362 parishes (24,649 inhabitants per parish), 759 priests (11,756 inhabitants per priest). Northeast Region II: states of Rio Grande to Norte, Paraíba, Pernambuco, and Alagoas; total area 236,801 square kilometers, 10,668,794 inhabitants (45.05 inhabitants per square kilometer), 458 parishes (23,398 inhabitants per parish), 856 priests (12,463 inhabitants per priest). Northeast Region III: states of Sergipe and Bahia; total area 581,915 square kilometers, 8,408,787 inhabitants (14.45 inhabitants per square kilometer), 538 parishes (23,572 inhabitants per parish), 569 priests (14,778 inhabitants per priest). East Region I: states of Guanabara and Rio de Janeiro; total area 43,334 square kilometers, 9,006,292 inhabitants (207.83 inhabitants per square kilometer), 425 parishes (21,191 inhabitants per parish), 1,245 priests (7,233 inhabitants per priest). East Region II: states of Minas Gerais and Espírito Santo; total area 573,796 square kilometers, 12,876,902 inhabitants (2.24 inhabitants per square kilometer), 1,019 parishes (12,636 inhabitants per parish), 1,948 priests (6,610 inhabitants per priest). Central Region: Federal District and parts of the states of Minas Gerais and

---

[11] Ibid. 22 (1962), 758.

[12] Ibid. 26 (1966), 377–79.

Goiás; total area 156,023 square kilometers, 1,079,836 inhabitants (6.92 inhabitants per square kilometer), 57 parishes (18,944 inhabitants per parish), 127 priests (8,502 inhabitants per priest). West Central Region: state of Goiás; total area 526,664 square kilometers, 2,566,703 inhabitants (4.87 inhabitants per square mile), 158 parishes (16,244 inhabitants per parish), 313 priests (8,200 inhabitants per priest). Far West Region: state of Mato Grosso and part of the territory of Rondônia; total area 1,228,903 square kilometers, 1,724,601 inhabitants (1.4 inhabitants per square mile), 95 parishes (18,153 inhabitants per parish), 521 priests (6,870 inhabitants per priest). South Region I: state of São Paulo, total area 244,906 square kilometers, 18,150,239 inhabitants (73.51 inhabitants per square kilometer), 1,194 parishes (15,201 inhabitants per parish), 2,911 priests (6,235 inhabitants per priest). South Region II: state of Paraná; total area 196,541 square kilometers, 6,958,420 inhabitants (35.4 inhabitants per square mile), 990 priests (7,028 inhabitants per priest). South Region III: state of Rio Grande do Sul; total area 267,528 square kilometers, 6,715,198 inhabitants (25.1 inhabitants per square kilometer), 563 parishes (11,927 inhabitants per parish), 1,523 priests (4,409 inhabitants per priest). South Region IV: state of Santa Catalina; total area 95,483 square kilometers, 2,922,449 inhabitants (30.6 inhabitants per square kilometer), 242 parishes (12,070 inhabitants per parish), 626 priests (4,668 inhabitants per priest).

The comprehensive pastoral perspective in an increasingly industrialized society, with all the accompanying symptoms, lays bare the inadequacy of the parishes for an effective work. This work must include a geographical area which we call the human zone, and it requires an integrated pastoral care. The plan of the Episcopal Conference refers to the conformity between the human zone and the pastoral zone. Because of the rapid industrial growth of Brazil the Church cannot allow itself to be taken in tow by history, it must foresee the development and adjust its work to this.[13]

Goals of the Church: The eleventh meeting of the Episcopal Conference from 16 to 27 May 1970, in which thirty lay persons of both sexes took part, proposed guidelines for a new orientation of the Church in Brazil. In the Church of Christ, it emphasizes, we are all equal because of the faith, baptism, and the common destiny. In this community lay persons and shepherds have a common responsibility for the building of the Church as a sign of the unity of people among themselves and of society with God.[14]

---

[13] ACB (1970–71), 2179–2208.

[14] REB 30 (1970), 415–25.

Catholic Universities and Schools

Four universities in Brazil have the status of papal universities: Rio de Janeiro since 22 January 1947, São Paulo since 25 January 1947, Pôrto Alegre since 1 November 1950, and Campinas since 8 September 1956. In Rome there has been since 1943 the Pontifício Colégio Pio Brasileiro, whose students, Brazilian citizens, attend lectures at the Gregoriana. The following Catholic universities must also be mentioned: Minas Gerais in Belo Horizonte, Campinas, Paraná in Curitiba, Goiás in Goiâna, Pernambuco (archdiocese of Olinda and Recife) with a theological institute, Pelotas and Petrópolis with institutes for theology, philosophy, and the humanities, São Leopoldo (archdiocese of Pôrto Alegre) with the university Do Rio dos Sinos (UNISINOS) and with a theological faculty and a university, Catholic law faculty at Santos, Catholic University of Salvador (archdiocese of Salvador); Manaus has a theological faculty, Taubaté a theological institute and a theological program for the laity.[15] In Curitiba the Claretians have operated since 7 May 1962 a Studium Theologicum in connection with the papal Lateran University at Rome, with theological programs for priests and lay persons.[16] The Conference of Brazilian Religious Superiors (CRB) inaugurated on 25 January 1965 the Theological Institute of São Paulo with four divisions— philosophy, theology, pastoral care, and catechetics.[17] The Theological Institute of Pôrto Alegre (1968) and similar institutions run by Franciscans, Jesuits, and other orders also have scholarly reputations.

The bishops of South Region I, with headquarters at São Paulo, met in 1969 with the religious superiors, male and female, of the region, in view of the defective schooling. The 130 persons present, including twenty bishops, decided to organize and support, within the range of the possible, centers, school clubs, and curricula for workers, in cooperation with the government and the religious institutes. They recommended the appointment of a bishop for the pastoral workers. They also recommended the use of educational television and a better employment of the means of social communication. They ascertained in the area of catechesis the faulty planning, lack of instructional means, and insufficient time for instruction. The São Paulo bishops were encouraged to send teachers of religion to every high school, although this measure would mean a considerable financial expense.[18]

---

[15] These cultural institutes are listed in Annuario Pontificio 1975 and in ACB (1970–71).

[16] REB 22 (1962), 757.

[17] REB 25 (1965), 349f.

[18] Ibid., 30 (1970), 178f.

Newspapers, Periodicals, Means of Social Communication

Since 1949 the Franciscans at Petrópolis have published the quarterly Eclesiástica Brasileira, with voluminous information, articles, studies, and reviews of works on the Brazilian Church. Also from the Franciscans of Petrópolis there has appeared since 1968 the monthly SEDOC—Serviço de documentação—with an international ecclesiastical documentation and commentaries and especially orientation to Latin America and Brazil. Since 1969 there have appeared two new theological periodicals: Atualização and Perspectiva theológica. Atualização offers theological information for lay persons; its coworkers are the professors of the Central Institute for Philosophy and Theology of the Catholic University of Minas Gerais. Its aim is to supply theological truth. Perspectiva theológica appeared on the occasion of the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the Theological Faculty of Cristo Rey at São Leopoldo, whose professors are the editors. As a means of investigation and information it set for itself as its special function the fostering of the presence of theological thought in the university world.[19] Since 30 November 1969 there has appeared weekly a Brazilian edition of Osservatore Romano.[20] On 12 December 1969 the information center Ecclesia (CIEC) was opened at São Paulo, whose purpose is to manage contact offices in all São Paulo cities, in the largest cities of the country, in America and Europe, and a Catholic news agency. Ecclesia has, for example, twenty-five radio stations and some 400 teachers and 5,000 assistants, who move across the country to make possible an education for Brazilians in the most remote areas.[21] A creative step of the Brazilian Church was to cut a series of records which reproduced the catechism in stories, told by means of actual happenings. The editors are priests, who are supported in their work by radio and television technicians. Each record has from three to four stories.[22]

Ecclesiastical Shortcomings

One feature of the Brazilian Church in the last ten years is its insecurity. In this period the adherents of Afro-Brazilian cults have increased about tenfold. In Salvador these centers have grown from 59 to over 900; in Recife there are almost 1,000; there are thousands in Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo. Spiritism has spread especially in the cities of the south; the Protestant Church of Brazil has the highest growth rate in the world. In this growth the Pentecostalists are ahead, followed by

---

[19] Ibid., 182.

[20] Ibid., 180.

[21] Ibid., 180f.

[22] Ibid., 22 (1962), 757.

Lutherans, Methodists, Presbyterians, and Baptists. Thirty percent of the Brazilian population maintain relations with spiritism. In the small state of Guanabara there are, for example, more than 10,000 centers, postos terrenos, approved by the government, where spiritism is engaged in. The same thing happens at São Paulo, Rio Grande do Sul, Minas Gerais, Bahia; 162 periodicals and newspapers recruit for it. The majority of visitors continue to call themselves Catholics. In 1953 the Brazilian Episcopal Conference declared that of all deviations spiritism was the worst.[23]

Communist infiltration, promoted among Brazilian students by the União Nacional de Estudiantes (UNE), was condemned on 1 June 1962 by Cardinal Jaime Barros Câmara, after consultation with the twenty-eight archbishops of the nation. He indicated the necessity of establishing a national student union with Christian principles.[24] A tireless but strongly demagogic proponent of the social activity of the Church is Helder Pessoa Câmara, born in 1909, second general assistant of the Catholic Action of Brazil, in 1952 auxiliary bishop of Rio de Janeiro, since 1964 archbishop of Olinda and Recife.

Religious Orders, Pastoral Cooperation

A positive element for pastoral cooperation with the Episcopal Conference is the Conference of the Brazilian Orders (CRB), founded on 11 February 1954 as the permanent union of all religious brothers and sisters. In 1972 there were in Brazil 11,279 brothers and 41,893 sisters; with the episcopate they constitute one of the most active groups within the Brazilian Church. They also made a significant contribution within Brazil's Catholic Action, founded in 1935. In the "Movement for a Better World," called into being by Father Lombardi in 1960, the goal of which is to supply help to the bishops, priests, religious, and lay persons in their work, priests, brothers, and sisters cooperate decisively. They move across Brazil and up to 1964 had presented 750 educational courses for bishops, priests, and seminarians, which were attended by 46,907 persons in twenty-two states and fifty-one dioceses. On the recommendation of John XXIII, the first effort for a common pastoral care was undertaken in 1962. The most important aim was the renewal of parishes, of the clergy, of the Catholic schools, and the integration of the workers. District secretariats were erected, and they were directed by a bishop, two priests, usually male religious, and several sisters. The sisters obeyed the appeal on a broad basis: they began new models of apostolic work: they assumed responsibility for parishes without pastors and worked in the district secretariats and in national institutions.

---

[23] Cf. REB 31 (1971), 402–7; B. Kloppenburg, "O Fantástico Crescimento das Igrejas Pentecostais no Brasil," REB 26 (1966), 653–56; "O Espiritismo no Brasil," REB 19 (1959), 842–71; AICA 16, 792 (2 March 1972), 17f.; AICA 17, 874 (20 September 1973), 25f.

[24] REB 22 (1962), 497f.

The Postconciliar Period

The Second Vatican Council produced an intensive participation of religious in the care of souls, both on the level of the diocese and on that of the state and nation. This cooperation in pastoral care is expressed in statistics thus: 1,803 brothers from clerical institutes; 1,602 brothers from secular institutes; 41,581 sisters, of whom 1,295 are cloistered; out of 13,135 priests, 8,105 are religious. Of the 4,500 Brazilian parishes, 2,000 are cared for by religious brothers and 32 by sisters. Of the 225 bishops, 97 are religious. Altogether 53,117 brothers and sisters work in the Brazilian Church. If one can speak of a genuine pastoral care in the north and far west of Brazil, in the states of Mato Grosso, Acre, Amazonas, and Pará, this is due to the thousands of religious who have renounced the comforts of Europe, the United States, or southern Brazil.[25]

Other church movements: There is no dearth of other ecclesiastical movements in Brazil. Thus, for example, there is the Asociaçião de Educação Catolica (AEC), founded in 1945, whose slogan is "Service." Its goals consist in uniting all Catholic educators—religious and lay; it is dedicated to the spread of Christian pedagogy and of the social doctrine of the Church, collaboration and presence in state bodies and similar organizations.[26] Another effective movement are the Cursillos de Cristianadad, which in the opinion of the Brazilian bishops "have brought about a profound change of general morality in society." In the archdiocese of São Paulo alone five priests devote themselves exclusively to the Cursillos; eight such Cursillos take place monthly. In all of Brazil sixty Cursillos are held in one month.[27] Of further great importance is the cooperation of the Legion of Mary in pastoral care. After its founding in 1951 it had the following structure in 1961: two senates (national council and district council), 166 curias (inferior councils), and 2,701 praesidia (local councils) with 24,914 active members, 158,580 assistants, and 79,155 helpers. The successes achieved speak for themselves: 1,814 adult baptisms, 7,429 rectified marriages, 15,560 persons brought back to the sacraments, 34,696 confessions and communions of the sick, 1,504 conversions. Further, the institution cares for 2,419 catechists' schools, with 175,531 hours of instruction for 39,769 children and 24,783 adults. The legion also employs groups for special tasks, as, for example, the care of recidivists (three groups) and of non-Catholics (one group). From its midst have come 357 vocations, 1,877 priests and 136 sisters. A further 1,877 members of the legion obliged themselves to attend Mass daily and communicate.[28] At the suggestion of Father Peyton, the apostle of the family rosary, and after an intensive recruitment, a mass rally of ca. 1.5 million persons took place on 16 December 1962 at Rio de Janeiro; 400 of them signed the promise to pray the rosary in the family.[29]

---

[25] C. Nogara, "Vida religiosa no Brasil," SEDOC 4 (January 1972), 845–58.

[26] Cf. M. da Cruz, 1945. Vinte anos a serviço da educação (1965).

[27] AICA 17, 847 (15 March 1973), 23, 26f.; detailed information on the history of the "Cursillos de Cristiandad" in Brazil in SEDOC 6 (July 1973), 75–100.

Formation of New Priests

From 23 to 26 October 1972 seminary professors met at Petrópolis to define the criteria and guidelines for the education of new priests.[30]

Catholic Missions among the Indians of Brazil

The Brazilian Church strove to continue its tradition among the Indians. The Catholic missionaries, united in Consejo Indigenista Misionero (CIMI), work according to the following guidelines: (1) slow education without haste or pressure, without breaking with the past; in this connection interference in the life and faith of the natives must be avoided; (2) knowledge of their cultures—and hence mastery of their languages—respect for them; this means that the native may freely select models offered to him. This does not mean: all or nothing. The work of the missionary must be slow but effective and enduring.[31]

Fraternal Associations

In his letter of 24 January 1974 to its chairmen, Pope Paul VI encouraged the Episcopal Conference to supply the light of faith to every Brazilian by the fraternal associations campaign. The campaign was proclaimed under the motto "Where is your brother?" This question contains an examination of conscience for all, what is done for the defense of our brothers' life, independently of their origin and of the conditions in which they live.[32]

---

[28] REB 23 (1963),220f.

[29] Ibid., 218; cf. ibid. 25 (1965), 311–13.

[30] SEDOC 5 (December 1972), 712–17.

[31] Ibid. 6 (June 1974), 1398f.

[32] Ibid. 6 (May 1974), 1232–38.

ARGENTINA

Argentina has an area of 2,987,000 square kilometers and in 1976 ca. 25 million inhabitants, of whom 94.9 percent were Catholics in 1971. Since World War I, industrialization; since 1930, an autarchist and planning phase, with growth of the proletariat.[33]

In 1974 the Church was organized in twelve archdioceses, forty dioceses, two prelacies, and one ordinary each for the Uniate Greek Orthodox and the Ukrainians. As an example of the internal structure, the archdiocese of Buenos Aires in 1969 was served by 353 diocesan priests, 84 priests from outside the diocese, 539 religious priests, a total of 976; 137 parishes, 52 other churches; 95 houses of male religious; and 246 houses of sisters, with 3,720 sisters.[34]

Outstanding among the Catholic organizations are: Junta Coordinadora de Superiores de Religiosos, Comisión Católica Argentina de Inmigración, Obra de Vocaciones Sacerdotales, Acción Católica with many subdivisions, Consejo Superior de Educación Católica, Movimiento Familiar Cristiano, Asociación Católica de Dirigentes de Empresa, Servicio Católico de Ayuda.[35]

Since 1960 Buenos Aires has had a papal Catholic University, and in addition a theological faculty and several other institutes on the university level. Catholic universities or university institutes are also to be found in Córdoba, Santa Fe, La Plata, Mar del Plata, San Juan, Tucumán, Bahía Blanca, Villa María; seminaries for priests in Buenos Aires, Azul, Catamarca (regional seminary), Córdoba, La Plata, Paraná, Rió Cuarto, Rosario, Salta, and Santa Fe.[36]

The politically most decisive event was the intervention in 1943 under the direction of General Rawson, which brought the liberal phase to an end. Juan Domingo Perón, vice-president of the republic and minister of defense in the government of the Oficiales Unidos (G.O.U.), labor minister under Pedro P. Ramírez, developed a policy of social reform and in 1946 emerged as victor in the election.[37]

With the support of the workers and by means of his new doctrine, Justicialismo, he exercised his dictatorship until 1955. The foundation of his policy soon faltered, so that the country was faced with a new crisis. Perón, who in the beginning had practiced a policy of friendly coexistence with the Church, strengthened his totalitarian aims from 1952 without sparing the Church. The official press began to make fun of Catholics, Catholic meetings and the university athenea of Santa Fe and Córdoba were forbidden; the cross was removed from official areas; religious instruction was forbidden in the schools; a divorce law was enacted, and houses of prostitution were again approved.

---

[33] Cf. V. Vives, Historia social y económica de España y América IV/2, 655–70.

[34] República Argentina. Anuario eclesiástico (1961), 131.

[35] Ibid., 117.

[36] Ibid., 1137–39.

[37] Cf. G. Furlong, The Church in the 20th Century, 783f.; R.E., Argentina (Época independiente), 347f.

Nevertheless, the Church remained unflinching, and the episcopate clung to its position with the support of the faithful. Lay persons and priests were arrested and abused. The persecution reached its climax on 11 June 1955; a large crowd gathered in Buenos Aires around the cathedral and on the neighboring plaza in order to hear Mass; then they moved in deep silence to the Congress buildings. A few days later, on 16 June, an attempt at revolt that miscarried was used by the government to mobilize its adherents. On the first day several churches were burned—San Francisco, San Roque, Santo Domingo, San Miguel, San Nicolás, and so forth. Also the episcopal palace, with the entire structure and the historical archives, became a victim of the flames. These events, without precedent in Argentina, produced a sharp reaction within as well as outside the country.[38]

In the period after Perón (from 1955) the revolutionary junta began to restore justice and peace. Although the divorce law, enacted in Perón's time, was deprived of force, the anti-Catholic cabinet members succeeded in maintaining the prohibition of religious instruction. During the government of Frondizi (1958–62) the law on freedom of education was passed, a law which has consistently been boycotted by liberals and Freemasons since 1952. Its establishment was the basis for the creation of Catholic universities.[39]

The Argentine Church after the Council

After the council the Catholic Church of Argentina, over and above the problems contingent on the political and socioeconomic situation, experienced other crises of an internal character. The twentieth International Congress for Sociology, held at Rió Tercero, Córdoba, from 5 to 11 September 1963, describes the period after 1930 as follows: "A time which was dominated by tensions and confrontations, conditioned by the existence of two opposed tendencies: the dynamic and the traditional,"[40] and which extended to theological, ascetical, pastoral, and psycho-sociological dimensions.

---

[38] Cf. G. Furlong, op.cit., 784; R.E., op.cit., 348.

[39] XX Congreso internacional de Sociologiá. Estudios (Buenos Aires 1963), 597–99.

[40] SEDOC 2 (Sept. 1969), 351–58; ibid. 2 (Oct. 1969), 491–506.

The declaration of the Argentine episcopate to the nation in 1969 can be regarded as a complete program. In it the bishops declare the Church to be the Sacrament of Christ and the possession of the poor, and they desire that the Argentine Church not only preach spiritual poverty but that it also live the poverty of Christ, helping the poor, while the Christian community makes itself responsible for its poor, and that justice rule social life so that each may keep what is his and all may be agents of the peace of Christ.

The decrees issued at Medellín, say the bishops, compel us to coordinate the common action; a beginning of this is made in the national pastoral plan with direct application to the basis of strengthening the parishes, and as a means of evangelization and of the physical presence of the Church in economically and geographically removed areas. To this end the bishops desire to set up in each diocese a commission for the means of social communication or at least to name a responsible person who maintains permanent contact with the Episcopal Conference and its departments of press, radio, cinema, and television in all those questions which concern exchange of information, curricula, moral orientation, and evaluation of behavior, prices, and so forth. The bishops have as their first duty to live according to the principles of pastoral co-responsibility.[41]

Difficulties within the Argentine Church

The tense situation which prevailed for some time in Argentina, accompanied by acts of violence, kidnappings, and murders, which caused a wave of protests, induced the Episcopal Conference on 12 August 1970 "as true shepherds of the Church" to communicate to all their message with the truth and love of Christ and his Church. The bishops recalled that the task entrusted by Christ to the Church is of neither a political nor economic nor social but of a religious nature, but from it proceed advantages, light, and strength, which represent an aid for the organizing and strengthening of human society. It does not authorize priests, by virtue either of their office or of the Church's social doctrine, to join any revolutionary movement whatsoever which seeks a Latin American socialism with the aim of socializing the means of production, the economy, and cultural policy; this also not with the justification that a social revolution allows a direct employment of force as a means of relieving the oppressed. In concord with Pope Paul VI the bishops condemned terrorist methods as means of struggle and declared openly: A movement of priests is Christian and has justification in the Catholic Church only in so far as it accepts the definition of the Second Vatican Council in the decree Lumen Gentium (no. 8).[42]

---

[41] Ibid. 4 (Aug. 1971), 191–97.

The priests replied to the bishops' declaration on behalf of the Third World during a meeting at Córdoba on 3 and 4 October 1970 in seven chapters and seventy paragraphs. In it they said they could not accept errors and guilt which others, especially the government and press, wanted to shift to them. Although they are ready to do penance, they are, however, of the opinion that others are the guilty ones. To the chief charge of the episcopal document to the priests of the Third World—deciding for socialism—they answered as follows: "It is familiar to everyone—and hence to our bishops—that, if the political collectivist solution also represents a danger, the actual situation which puts our people under pressure is of a capitalist nature: the Latin American entrepreneur system; for this reason the present economy corresponds to a false notion of the right of private ownership of the means of production and of the goals of the economy." The Congress of Medellín (Justicia 10) was called to mind, and in this connection was supplemented: "No one can fail to recognize that the most urgent task in Latin America consists in achieving a complete renewal of the evaluation and measures of the entrepreneurs in regard to their goals, organization, and management.

"This situation," continued the priests, "induces us to demand the search for a new social system in which man is not exploited by man; in order to bring about such a solution, we see no other way than the socializing of the means of production, power, and culture."[43]

The Determining of the Functions of Priests

On 3 June 1972 the priests published at Buenos Aires for the Third World a common answer to the questionnaire on the preparation for the Synod, which was to take place at Rome with the theme of the function of priests. This questionnaire, sent by Monsignor Juan Carlos Arámburu, auxiliary bishop of Buenos Aires, to the priests of the archdiocese, contained the following sections: the function of the priest; temporal activity of the priest; the priest as "sign of unity"; "universality" of the priest; the new priesthood; prayer; celibacy. In this regard it was expressed that the priest is in the service of the redemption of mankind, and hence his activity must be in harmony with the activities of people and of society, otherwise not only are guidelines abandoned but also forces and realities are denied which contain evangelical values such as justice and brotherhood.[44]

---

[42] Ibid. 197–234.

[43] Ibid. 234–38.

The "Emergency Housing Districts" of Buenos Aires

In his letter of 22 September 1969 Arámburu referred to the "Emergency Housing Districts" of Buenos Aires, a "sad and painful reality," which needed the service of the Church and are open "to the poor." He encouraged priests, religious brothers, and laity to cooperate further in this apostolic task.[45] Only a profound revolutionary action can bring a solution and transform these slums into workers' quarters.[46]

The "Priests for the Third World" United with the People

On the occasion of their fifth meeting in August-September 1972 the "Priests for the Third World" declared that, in view of the political and socioeconomic situation, they were united with the people. They stressed this pastoral position in a progammatic document,[47] in a letter to the Argentine episcopate,[48] and in another document in which they declared their intention not to leave their oppressed people in the lurch.[49]

The voices of the bishops: In this climate of political and economic confusion the Episcopal Conference met at San Miguel from 19 to 21 October 1972. Its announcement contains the following points: historical reality (I); the negative aspects of the Argentine situation (II); positive aspects and human values (III); liberalism and Marxism: political, economic, and social order (IV); socialism (V); possible decisions (VI); preparations (VII); urgent problems (VIII); summary (IX); specific contributions (X). The position of the bishops is clear: the economy must serve people and not vice versa; private ownership, even in the means of production, must accommodate itself to the general welfare; neither liberalism nor Marxism; nationalization limited to the needs of society or in questions of the defense of private property or of national sovereignty; a broad sharing of workers and employees in enterprises guarantees identification with the goals set; having a voice in the great political questions; providing of help for the coordinating organs; truth and loyalty in the quest of the general welfare of the nation.[50] The Argentine Church thereby testified to its balance and efficacy within its pastoral task, the aim of which is the redemption of people.

---

[44] Ibid. 3 (Sept. 1970), 341–43.

[45] Ibid., 343–46.

[46] Ibid., 346–48; ibid. 5 (Feb. 1973), 1011f.

[47] Ibid. 6 (Oct. 1973), 501–12.

[48] Ibid. 5 (Feb. 1973), 1011–16.

[49] Ibid., 1016.

The Church's Functions

Cardinal Raúl Francisco Primatesta, archbishop of Córdoba, explained during the Roman Synod of 1974 the evangelizing and liberalizing aspect of the Argentine Church. In this connection he remarked that the individual is considered as the object of evangelization in his individuality, in his transcendence, in his dynamism, and in his development. This evangelizing work devotes its special attention to the nonpracticing.

Further, the object of evangelization is the Universal Church in all its elements, society as such, and the individual in all vocations. "It is important to avoid the clericalization of the laity and the secularization of the priests." The cardinal dealt also with the accusation that the Church enters into no secular compromises; with the mistakes of some members of the clergy, who use the Word of God for their political aims; with the cooperation of women in evangelization and the evaluation of the work of religious brothers and sisters.

The cardinal called attention to the fact that the object of evangelization is the totality of revelation under the guidance of the Church. The content of revelation must be entirely presented: the transcendence of evangelization, its dimension and spread to worship; the problem of faith, culture, and religious sentiment; the points of contact between the Gospel and liberation as one of the most important questions of Latin America.[51]

PARAGUAY

Paraguay has a total area of 406,752 square kilometers and 2.57 million inhabitants, of whom more than 90 percent are mestizos; in 1971 96.2 percent were Catholics (United Nations statistics of 1976). The history of Paraguay shows disturbed years in the most recent past. Under the presidency of José Guaggiari (1930–32) the country was unable to avoid a frontier quarrel with Bolivia. The outcome was the Chaco War of 1932–35, which ruined the country and caused great losses among the male youth. After the war Paraguay began industrialization. In recent years relations with the United States and Bolivia have been strengthened. The methodical development of the airways is expressed in a flourishing economy;

---

[50] Ibid., 1017–24.

[51] Osservatore Romano, 3 Oct. 1974.

Asunción grows in importance as a commercial junction. According to the latest computations of the CEPAL 1,552 large landowners and foreign firms possess 31.5 million hectares of the land, while 250,000 families with about 1 million persons control only 500,000 hectares.[52]

Ecclesiastical Organization

The archdiocese of Asunción has as suffragans the dioceses of Caacupé, Concepción, Coronel Oviedo, San Juan Bautista de las Misiones, and Villarrica, the prelacies of Alto Paraná and Encarnación, the vicariates apostolic of Chaco Paraguayo and Pilcomayo.[53] The most important Catholic associations are: Catholic Association of Paraguay, Christian Family Movement, Legion of Mary, Christian Curricula, Third Order of Saint Francis, and Salesian Societies. There are 181 parishes and 21 which can be classified as such; 202 priests and 181 religious brothers; 18 religious houses of men and 39 of women.[54]

Educational Institutions

Since 2 February 1965 the republic has had the Catholic university Nuestra Señora de la Asunción at Asunción with faculties of philosophy, pedagogy, law, political science, and political economy. Also in Asunción are faculties of law, politics, and social science, founded in 1960, and a university institute for family education, founded in 1963; a university of theology and religious science, founded in 1971; a university of international law. In Villarrica there are faculties of philosophy and education, founded in 1961, and a juridicopolitical and social science faculty. Concepción has a faculty of philosophy and education; Encarnación, an educational and philosophical faculty. Religious institutes run numerous schools and institutes.[55]

Protests of the Bishops

In a letter of 29 January 1969 the archbishop of Asunción, Juan José Anibal Mena Porta, asked the president of the Republic, Alfredo Stroessner, "with consideration of Christian demands for justice, to examine the situation of those who, by order of Your Excellency and without trial, are under police custody, either because of their ideology or because of alleged crimes of antidemocratic subversion."[56] On the occasion of the consultations on a draft of a new law, "The Defense of Democracy and of the Political and Social Order of the State" (1969), the bishops, as shepherds and citizens, sent a letter to the Congress and expressed their concern in view of the danger which the new law could represent for the country's awareness. According to the bishops' opinion it was a question here of a glorification of absolutism, which had often been condemned by the Popes.[57]

---

[52] Christus, 410 (July–December 1970), 778f.; SC, Paraguay (Época independiente), 172–75.

[53] Annuario Pontificio (1977) 957.

[54] Anuario eclesiástico del Paraguay (1972), 21–27.

[55] Annuario Pontificio (1974) 1371; Anuario eclesiástico del Paraguay (1972), 27–29.

On 22 October 1969 the Jesuit Father Francisco de Paula Oliva, professor at the Catholic university of Asunción, was expelled from the country. As a protest, on the very same day teachers and students organized a Via Crucis, at the end of which the police dispersed the participants. In a declaration of 26 October 1969, the episcopate informed all the faithful of these events and threatened with excommunication all who mistreated priests and sisters. As a sign of its protest and pain, the Church of Paraguay gave up the celebration of Masses on this day.[58] Father Bartolomé Vanrell, the Jesuit provincial, also protested in a letter to the minister of the interior against the expulsion of Father Vicente Barreto,[59] and Monseñor Bogarín Argaña, bishop of San Juan Bautista de Las Misiones, in a letter to Father Barreto condemned the conduct of the authorities.[60] The kidnapping of the priest Uberfil Monzón, collaborator of the Lay Secretariat of CELAM, by police officers on a public street near the Uruguay Plaza became the occasion for a series of complaints by church authorities.[61]

In its meeting of 18 December 1970 the Episcopal Conference declared its solidarity with the desires and hopes of the population and stated that the strivings for peace and justice were in a blind alley. The bishops indicated the injustices in the country and expected from those responsible that they would listen without emotion to the voice of the Church's representatives.[62]

Two Worlds Developing

On 15 May 1972, following a meeting of 8–10 May, the archbishop of Asunción, Ismael Blas Rolón Silvero, S.D.B., together with priests and many lay persons, issued a document in which they expressed themselves on the kidnapping and expulsion of Father José Caravias, active at Piribebuy in the Diocese of Caacupé. The analysis of the situation, they said, places the nation before two worlds: a sociopolitical authoritarian system, which existed with the aid of propaganda only for the advantage of a few; on the other hand, we experience the slow growth of a Church reforming itself, which takes a stand for more justice. The participants in the meeting pointed out the injustices perpetrated against the Church.[63]

---

[56] Christus 410 (July–December 1970), 780–83.
[57] SEDOC 2 (Jan. 1970), 921–24.
[58] Ibid., 924–26.
[59] Ibid. 5 (Oct. 1972), 491f.
[60] Ibid., 492–94.
[61] Ibid. 4 (Aug. 1971), 240–50.
[62] Ibid., 239f.

When on 14 May Paraguay celebrates the anniversary of its independence, the archbishop of Asunción wrote to the chief of protocol of the government on 10 May 1972, it would be logical to believe that this memorial day would be in tune with the right of all citizens to liberty. In all churches of the archdiocese there would be prayers on 14 and 15 May that the freedom achieved by our ancestors would also become full reality.[64] In an open letter of 18 May 1972 the Episcopal Conference justified the nonparticipation of the religious schools in the festivities at the desire of the students themselves without their having been in any way influenced.[65]

The Function of Priests

To do away with misunderstandings and doubts, the competent committee of the Episcopal Conference on 16 May 1972 published a statement on the function of priests, especially since more and more priests were accused of playing a totally subversive role in politics. In it the judgments of the Second Vatican Council were taken into consideration. Priests who live together with the peasants, said the document, tried to expose the harshness of life with the light of the Gospel, always within the guidelines recognized and issued by the bishops. Bishops, priests, and laity know very well that a continuing renewal is indispensable. To this task they devoted all their energy. The rights of the authorities and the national constitution are respected, and the faithful are urged to respect them also.[66] In an open letter to all the faithful on the occasion of the regular meeting of 1972 the bishops stated: If persons are oppressed, whether by unjust economic structures or abuses of power, the Church embodies the prophetic complaint and acts as a moral force in favor of liberation and human rights. The Church must not be seen as a political party, especially as its function surpasses every secular function and every political schema. Its goal is of an eschatological nature, and the liberation of people sought by it can only be fully achieved in the next world.[67]

---

[63] Ibid. 5 (Oct. 1972), 495–500.

[64] Ibid., 500f.

[65] Ibid., 505–7.

[66] Ibid., 501–3.

Church-State Relations

The advisory organ for the relations of Church and state, established in 1973 by the Episcopal Conference, should be oriented to maintaining the freedom and independence of the Church according to the teaching of the Second Vatican Council and the directions of the Medellín Congress in harmony with the position occupied by the Church of Paraguay. Affairs of interest to both sides should be discussed, especially if they have a national impact; further, studies should be undertaken on the relations of Church and state. The present constitution of Paraguay officially recognizes the Catholic religion, and the archbishop of Asunción is a member of the Council of State. In addition, subsidies and other advantages in favor of church institutions are maintained.[68]

URUGUAY

Uruguay has a total area of 186,926 square kilometers and in 1972 had 2,972,871 inhabitants; 90.6 percent are Catholics. Since 1911 dictatorships and democratic systems have alternated in the Uruguayan government. In 1951 Andrés Martínez Trueba reformed the constitution: a council of nine replaced the president; the council of ministers and both chambers were retained; new social legislation established the welfare state; the public service industries and many other enterprises were nationalized. The elections of 1958 for the first time gave victory to the "white majority," whereas the "colored" party emerged as victor of the elections of 27 November 1966. The National Executive Council was abolished, and there was a return to the presidential system; Oscar Gestido was elected president in 1967. The events of the last years have produced no internal calm in the country. Uruguay records an unsteady growth in the number of inhabitants. The population consists almost entirely of whites, together with a very small number of mestizos; the Indians have died out. The country's economy is restricted almost exclusively to cattle raising. Ninety percent of the rural enterprises engage in cattle breeding, only 10 percent in agriculture; but the metal, textile, and chemical industries have developed.[69]

[67] AICA 17, 817 (August 1972), 31f.

[68] Ibid. 874 (September 1973), 27f.

[69] R. E., Uruguay (Época independiente), 870; Vicens Vives, op. cit. IV/2, 653f.

Ecclesiastical Structure

Uruguay has one metropolitan see, Montevideo, with the suffragan dioceses of Canelones, Florida, Maldonado-Punta del Este, Melo, Mercedes, Minas, Salto, and San José de Mayo y Tacuarembó.[70] There are 215 parishes in the nation, 92 other pastoral stations, 698 priests, 230 male religious, and 1,981 sisters.[71] The new constitution, ratified in 1935 by a referendum of the people with 280,000 affirmative, 10,000 negative, and 70,000 abstentions, permits freedom of abortion and euthanasia. Immorality is spread by means of the so-called biographical movie; about 80 percent of the cinema productions at Montevideo were of a pornographic nature. The government was content to issue a law on biographical films for minors.

The republic had no official religion. In the effort to obtain a greater liberty in regard to its public announcements and to support its schools, the Church makes progress. The great Eucharistic Congress of 1934 gave Catholicism a powerful impetus. The Church's educational institutions increased because of the freedom recognized in the constitution. Ca. 20,000 children were instructed in schools of religious institutes, many others in parochial schools. Catholic Action received new impulses through the instruction of 31 January 1955 of the bishop of Salto to his priests to support it. The Church's pastoral work was impaired by the immorality, the pornography, the influence of the Freemasons, Protestantism, especially at Montevideo by the Salvation Army and the Y.M.C.A.[72] On the occasion of its meeting in October 1968 the episcopate of Uruguay accepted the decrees of Medellín and bound itself to translate these into practice, with special attention to the problems of the poor and the oppressed. The bishops referred the current situation to a growing moral crisis, which originated in a materialistic concept of life and had effects on the public, economic, social, cultural, and family order. It is the task of the Church to strengthen awareness, to inspire and promote, to stimulate and to support all initiatives which contribute to the formation of the person, and to condemn all that is directed against justice and peace. True liberation must have as its basis inner change. The Christian message stresses rather the change in the person than the necessity of structural change.[73]

---

[70] Annuario Pontificio 1977, 957.

[71] Guiá de la Iglesia católica en el Uruguay (1973).

[72] Revista Javeriana 4, 355–63.

[73] SEDOC 1, 1439–41.

Celibacy

In the note of 14 April 1970 on priestly celibacy the episcopate of Uruguay expressed the desire to orient in harmony with their pastoral function priests, religious, and Catholic laity, to avoid misunderstandings which cause only harm. In agreement with the Pope and the bishops of the entire world they explain the true idea of the Church in regard to priestly celibacy and identify themselves with the relevant statements of the magisterium. Celibacy is suited to bring home to many young people, who rebel against the bourgeoisie and seek a new world, the value and power of attraction of a vocation which obliges them to total sacrifice to God and mankind. The bishops desire and hope that those who follow God's call will receive an answer of faith and love from the People of God.[74]

Renewal in the Light of the Second Vatican Council and of the Congress of Medellín

In a pastoral letter of 22 November 1970 the bishops proclaimed their wish to push forward the renewal desired by the Second Vatican Council and the second meeting of the Latin American episcopate at Medellín. The Church of Uruguay, like the Church in general, is in a critical stage full of fears, expectations, and hopes. The bishops understand the complaint of many Catholics who see the inner unity of the Church in jeopardy. The Church, whose function consists in continuing to the end of time the presence, task, and redeeming work of Jesus Christ, must renew itself in accord with the ideals of the Second Vatican Council, without identifying this function with that of the Christian lay person in the social, economic, and political liberation of people. The lay person must be supported by his Christian vocation, but he cannot appeal to an official representation of the Church, for this does not belong to his sphere of duty; this would mean a retrogression into a new kind of clericalism. Dialogue in the Church is always constructive, clarifies prejudices and doubts, strengthens faith, demands mutual understanding, accepts legitimate pluralism, and gives it a new value. Finally, it brings about that all are of one mind (1 Cor. 10). To those who hope for an elimination of injustice by the employment of force the bishops retort that force is neither Christian nor evangelical and that one evil cannot be fought with a greater evil. Instead of seeking the guilty, people must ascertain what deeds or omissions led to this situation.[75]

In a letter of 12 June 1972 the permanent Commission of the

---

[74] Ibid. 3, 779–81.

[75] Ibid. 4, 995–1005.

Episcopal Conference repeated, "in view of the difficult situation in the country," that the bishops also desire profound changes in the country in order to create a fraternal solidarity among all; hence the radical demands of the subversive groups must be regarded as a new mistake among many others. Further, the letter condemned the inhuman treatment of prisoners, independently of whether they were subversively active or not. Tortures cannot produce peace, not to mention that confessions extracted under terror are valueless and cause injuries that cannot be repaired.[76]

CHILE

Chile has a total area of 741,767 square kilometers and in 1968 had a population of 8,262,556 inhabitants and in 1976 of 10.4 million. In 1969 the Church of Chile included five archdioceses, fourteen dioceses, two prelacies, and two vicariates apostolic. At the same time there were 971 diocesan priests and 1,553 religious priests active in 734 parishes. There were 281 houses of male religious and 647 of female, and 342 educational institutes with 294,534 pupils, 14 hospitals, and 159 other relief institutions.[77]

The Chilean economy had developed by leaps and bounds during World War I; but the new wealth was for the benefit of only a thin upper class, so that in 1920 Alessandri was elected president as representative of the disadvantaged masses. Since he could not keep his promises, not least because of the boundary strife with Peru and Bolivia over the port of Arica and the Saltpeter Coast, he was toppled by the military under General Ibáñez, who became president of the republic, first in 1927, then again in 1952, and who continued the process of industrialization that had already begun. The Falangist Party, which had separated from the Conservative Party in the years after 1940, joined with the Communists in the election. Their commitment in the social sphere evoked strong tensions between the church leadership and the youth, which led to the dissolution of the Asociación Nacional de Estudiantes Católicos (ANEC) and other societies of Catholic Action. Nevertheless, progress in the social field is the most conspicuous phenomenon of the Chilean Church of that period. The farmhands organized unions, agrarian reform was discussed—things not permitted previously. The official Church gradually turned away from the great proprietors and thereby took its place in this new development.

In the course of the years after 1950 the fact of economic underdevelopment became ever more obvious. The nation regarded itself as poor. It did not escape the young Catholics that, despite a technical progress, the poverty of the broad masses became greater; they concluded that the social question could not be solved independently of the economic and political problems.

---

[76] Ibid. 5, 603–6.

[77] Cf. Vivens Vives, op. cit. IV/2, 636–41; Guiá parroquial y guiá eclesiástica de Chile (Santiago de Chile 1969).

In Search of a Uniform Ecclesiastical Activity

The general situation demanded uniform action: lay persons and priests joined in a common action with the aim of transforming the old Falange into Democracia Christiana. Influence on this development was also exercised by the Centro Bellarmino (1959), the Alianza para el Progreso (1961), the pastoral letters of the Chilean episcopate on the situation in agriculture and the political and social duty of Catholics (1962), and finally the stimuli of the Second Vatican Council. The underdeveloped state of the nation was regarded on one side as a consequence of the development of the rich countries, especially of the United States; on the other side the models of Cuba and Vietnam—names such as Fidel Castro, Camilo Torres, Ché Guevara—and the guerrilla wars in various countries of South America contributed to the growth in many of the revolutionary idea and the hope for a new human being on a new continent by means of a radical modification of the system.

The Conference of the Latin American Episcopate at Medellín in 1968 condemned with full publicity the dependence of the continent and announced a program of church reform, which stirred a loud echo in Chile. At Allende's election in 1970 the Catholics supported all candidates. In a spoken and written word—newspapers and periodicals—it was expressed that the Church was not basically against this government of a Marxist stamp.[78] Catholics on the right regarded the faith as an exclusively religious attitude, oriented to God alone. In relation to politics they persisted in the, in their view, only valid Catholic viewpoint and regarded themselves as guardians of morality and religion. They refused a change of their old morals and any novelty. On the left they were for the most part young priests, who had committed themselves in workers' and students' environments, and lay persons with an ideology of the left. For these a political confrontation and a revolution were unrenounceable, since only it meant the total redemption of mankind; they were an affair of the individual Christians and of the Church itself. The majority of the Chilean Church, bishops, priests, and faithful, were oriented to the center. Without having expressly decided for the Democracia Cristiana, they preferred it to all other parties. They desired a nonpolitical Church, devoted only to conciliar reform and renewal. Nevertheless, they regarded the opening to the world as an ingredient of theology and spirituality, but proceeding from the principle of autonomy. In this group, of course, various opinions were combined.

---

[78] A. Fontaine, S.S.C.C., "La Iglesia católica chilena en los últimos 20 años," Mensaje 202–3 (Sept.–Oct. 1971), 422–52.

The majority of Catholics is today anticapitalist and represents a certain non-Marxian socialism. Starting from the renewing spirit of the Second Vatican Council, the Chilean Church has reformed its liturgy, accepted priests who represent new ideas, allowed changes in the religious life, and begun a broad dialogue with the political organs and other denominations.

Attempt at a Balance

The bishops, by means of their varied activities in the dioceses claimed, but did not have sufficient time, to adapt themselves to the problems of the entire country and to devote themselves to them. Also, their contacts with the secularized world suffered from the same shortcoming, so that a dialogue with lay persons and priests who were prepared to help and a total plan could come into existence only with great difficulty. As positive elements of the life of the Chilean Church can be listed progress in the reform of the religious life with many new perceptions, especially in the practical care of souls. The classical youth movements, of great efficacy in previous years, are in a serious crisis. The disintegration within the priestly vocation is regrettable; many priests abandon their vocation, and in general it lacks vitality.[79]

Christians for Socialism

Eighty priests met in Santiago de Chile from 14 to 16 April 1971 to speak on the topic "Participation of Christians in the Building of Socialism in Chile." "The Eighty," as they were called, affirmed their membership in the clergy and at the same time their sympathy with socialism: they then formed a "Priests' Secretariat of Christians for Socialism." Eight months later the word "Priests' " was dropped, since they began to accept lay persons also into their ranks. At the end of their first meeting they composed a "Declaration of the Eighty," in which they expressed their wish to work together with the Marxists for the construction of socialism in Chile. Marxism, they said, is a means for the analyzing and changing of society; the Christian faith must be freed of everything that prevents the faithful from cooperating with the Marxists. A week later, on 23 April 1971, twelve professors of theology of the University of Santiago de Chile in an open letter declared their agreement with the declaration of "The Eighty." From this moment on, expressions of sympathy for this movement increased in and outside Chile. Three months later, from 16 to 18 July, about 200 priests participated in a meeting which was organized by the "Priests' Secretariat of Christians for Socialism." Thus originated the "Group of 200." From these two cells, constituted exclusively by priests, arose the movement "Christians for Socialism," which spread from America to Europe.

---

[79] A. Fontaine, S.S.C.C., "Situación actual de la Iglesia chilena," Mensaje 201, 367–72.

The movement obtained a strong stimulus through the meeting of the groups with Fidel Castro, on the occasion of his visit to Chile. 140 priests attended the meeting. They adopted the theses represented by Castro that Christians should regard themselves as "strategic," and not only tactical, "allies" of the Marxists in the liberation of Latin America, and that the Christian can accept Marxism as a method with a quiet conscience without coming into conflict with his faith. Castro invited twelve Chilean priests to Cuba, to work there voluntarily for some weeks. Following this, they published in the Cuban newspaper Gramma a declaration on 6 March 1972: condemnation of capitalism as source of all evil in Latin America, historical necessity of socialism, moral obligation of all Christians to fight together with the Marxists for liberation from institutionalized force. At the Episcopal Conference in Punta de Tralca from 7 to 11 April 1973, the bishops, after a comprehensive theological and pastoral assessment of the orientation of the clergy, came to the following conclusion: No priest and no religious can join the movement "Christians for Socialism."[80]

Situation of the Chilean Church

On the occasion of the Roman Synod of Bishops of 1974 Monseñor Valdés Subercaseaux, bishop of Osorno, explained the situation of the Chilean Church: Since the beginning of the century the Chilean people have been under the influence of the errors of economic liberalism and of Marxian materialism. Among the 85 percent of Catholics it is difficult to ascertain how many of them take an active part in the Church's life. The Church is aware of the social problem, and many priests and lay persons are working for its solution. But first it is neccessary to change the mentality of persons in order then to alter the unjust social structures. Today the young rarely devote themselves to the religious and priestly vocation or to the lay apostolate. They prefer to dedicate themselves to social and political action. The intellectuals—priests and lay—represent another problem, because they often question ecclesiastical life, the Pope, the priestly identity, and the importance of the religious life. "Liberation Theology" leads to a purely secular-oriented social activity and pushes spiritual values into oblivion. The Chilean Church, said the bishop, does not remain inactive and is seeking new forms of evangelization.[81] [80] B. Sorge, Le scelte e le tesi dei "Cristiani per il socialismo" alla luce dell'insegnamento della Chiesa (Turin 1974); "Evangelio, política y socialismo. Documento de trabajo de la Conferencia episcopal de Chile," Christus 438(Mexico, 1 May 1972), 32–42; "Primer encuentro. Cristianos por el socialismo (documento final)," Christus 440(Mexico, 1 July 1972), 53–58; "Jerarquías chilena y mexicana ante el primer encuentro latinoamericano de 'cristianos por el socialismo,'" Christus 442 (1 Sept. 1972), 41–59; AICA 16, 793 (2 March 1972), 15f.; AICA 16, 807 (8 June 1972), 28f.; SEDOC 4(Nov. 1972), 614–32.

---

BOLIVIA

Bolivia has a total area of 1,126,240 square kilometers and is, then, the fifth largest nation in South America. In 1960 it had 3,371,791 inhabitants,[82] of whom 63 percent were Indians;[83] in 1976, according to the UN statistics, 5,470,000 inhabitants, of whom more than 50 percent were Indians and 28 to 30 percent mestizos.

Ecclesiastical Structure

Bolivia has four metropolitan sees: La Paz with the prelacies of Corocoro and Coroico, Sucre with the suffragan sees of Potosí and Tarija, Cochabamba with Oruro and the prelacy of Aiquile, and Santa Cruz de la Sierra; six vicariates apostolic: Chiquitos, Cuevo, El Beni, Ñuflo de Chávez, Pando, and Reyes.[84] In 1960 there were 189 diocesan priests, 763 religious brothers, 1,733 sisters, and 354 parishes. The formalism of the Bolivian Church of 1970 produced the following organizational commissions: doctrine and catechesis, means of social communication, seminaries and vocations, lay apostolate, liturgy, music and art, education, social actions, missions, economic planning. In addition, the following secretariates were set up: missions, means of social communication, education, doctrine and catechesis, social studies, Bolivian Caritas. In 1974 there were in Bolivia 913 priests—355 diocesan and 558 religious—and 1,637 sisters; of these last, 931 were foreigners. Lay movements with effective activity are: Legión de María, Movimiento familiar cristiano, and Cursillos de cristianidad. Over and above these are numerous institutes, the Catholic University of La Paz under the direction of the Jesuits, schools, high schools, homes for the aged, hospitals, which are administered by religious, male and female.[85] At Sucre the Jesuits operate the broadcasting company "Radio Loyola."

---

[81] Osservatore Romano, 4 Oct. 1974.

[82] Anuario eclesiástico de Bolivia para el año del Señor 1960; Guía de la Iglesia de Bolivia (1970), 5–9.

[83] Christus 410 (Mexico, July–Dec. 1970), 740.

[84] Annuario Pontificio 1977, 954.

The Bolivian people have the lowest standard of living of the American continents. Mine workers suffer severely from the change from the high temperatures underground to the cold of the mountains, where their dwellings do not provide adequate protection. A great part of the miners therefore are tubercular: their life expectancy is about thirty-five years. At the moment the Corporación minera boliviana (COMIBOL) is the largest mining enterprise with 25,000 employees and is responsible for 60 percent of the total gross national product. Politically, Bolivia is a turbulent country. Since independence it has had more than 180 changes of government.[86]

Human Solidarity

At the meeting of the bishops, priests, and laity in Cochabamba in February 1968, in which they sought to bring their understanding of their roles into harmony with the Second Vatican Council, they published a declaration: the schools are not accessible to all social classes, especially the poor; the support of the priests is particularly not realistically taken care of; the youth, hope of the Church, and social justice are neglected; means available are used for the building of houses and churches and in this the Christian community is forgotten; ecclesiastical office is often exercised more as a right than as a ministry. For the future the Church will do everything to measure up to its duty and responsibility; in this regard it relies on all Bolivians and on all countries and undertakings which share in the development of Bolivia.[87]

Defense of the Miners

Jorge Manrique, archbishop of La Paz, several bishops, forty-five miner-priests, and some lay persons met at Oruro in July 1968 and analyzed the situation of the miners and the treaty concluded in March 1968 between state and Church on the mining problem. In a letter from La Paz of 20 July 1968 the miners' union (ASIB) presented its demands to the group. The Church should end its connection with the regime; they, the Christian union members, are revolutionaries.[88]

---

[85] Anuario eclesiástico de Bolivia para el año del Señor 1960; Guía de la Iglesia de Bolivia (1970), 5–9.

[86] Christus 410 (Mexico, July–Dec. 1970), 740f.

[87] Ibid. 386 (Mexico, Jan.–July 1968), 362–67.

[88] SEDOC 1 (Dec. 1969), 887–94.

The most important social and religious problems of the country were taken up by the bishops in a document of 15 August 1968: The Church is in the service of truth, justice, and fraternal charity; it must especially promote the realization of social justice in a dynamic of development to freedom on the regional, national, and international plane. It must renew itself by a social pastoral work: "We are aware," it was said, "that worldly work is a redeeming work, because the function of Christ is of a universal nature. Through the impetus of fraternal charity we are ready to cooperate with all men of goodwill, because every man is redeemed by Christ, is a child of God, who claims our cooperation and our services.[89]

Miner Priests

The fourth Congress of Miner Priests published the decrees of Oruro of 31 July 1969: Capitalism is condemned, "aware of the redeeming message of Christ and of our task in the world, we oblige ourselves to intensify our exertions in the service of Bolivia's miners in their struggle for freedom."[90] On the basis of information on the collaboration of priests in the mass rallies and on political sermons, members of the Episcopal Conference declared on 10 September 1969: "We are of the opinion that the function of priests is incompatible with membership in a political party, if it demands compliance with peculiar objectives of party doctrine which close the door to other groupings; thereby their universality in the service of all is placed in question." They support their attitude with the teaching of the Second Vatican Council and the declarations of the Congress of Medellín of 1968.[91]

The opposition between the Bolivian Episcopal Conference and the Secretariat for Social Action caused the chairman of the Commission for Social Action, Jesús Agustín López de Lama, bishop of Corocoro, to resign his office. The secretariat was temporarily closed; the decision affected the relations of the conference to Iglesia y Sociedad para América Latina (ISAL), a movement which cooperated very closely in Bolivia with the Secretariat for Social Action.[92]

New Initiatives

At the time forty-five Aymará Indians were preparing for the diaconate. These natives—ca. 3.3 million of them live in the mountains of [89] Ibid. 1 (April 1969), 1365–88.

---

[90] Christus 410 (Mexico, July–Dec. 1970), 742–44.

[91] Ibid., 744–46.

[92] SEDOC 4 (Feb. 1972), 1005–10.

Bolivia and Peru—are catechists, who after training are ordained deacons in order to care for their fellows.[93]

In this declaration Cardinal José Clemente Maurer, C.S.S.R., archbishop of Sucre, proposed to sell all the property collected by the Church of Bolivia in the course of four hundred years in order to expedite the construction of social institutions. Following this proposal the Oblates donated all their goods for the building of schools and public hospitals in Bolivia.[94]

Within its social program, the Church of Bolivia built houses for poor families and persons of moderate means.[95] Every residential district provided a church, school, outpatient department, and other services. The land for construction was donated by the Franciscans of Sucre. The construction itself was financed by donations which Cardinal Maurer collected in Trévesis, his diocese of origin.[96] Furthermore, ca. 200 hospitals were built in the country by the Church, and almost all savings groups came out of the parishes. Several programs for systematic education were taken up by the Church. In the entire country there was a network of centers which originated in the Church's initiative. More than 2,000 volunteers worked in the programs of several broadcasting companies which were heard in hundreds of centers. This entire work was realized by the Church by means of institutions of various kinds.[97]

Increase of Priestly Vocations

Although the number of priestly ordinations is still too small in comparison with the priests needed, said Cardinal Maurer of Sucre, vocations are increasing in Bolivia. Some eighty seminarians will shortly be ordained, and married deacons will soon help the overburdened priests. The latest statistics establish that, of 913 priests who are active in the sixteen dioceses, only ca. 200 were born in the country.[98] North American missionaries support five catechetical centers among the Aymará Indians and in recent years have trained some one thousand catechists. Of these, 100 were chosen for the diaconate. The positive experience among the Aymarás has led to this beginning among the Quechuas, whose number is estimated at 1.2 million. In Bolivia there are 293 North American missionaries, including two laymen, forty-two diocesan priests, 11 religious priests from five congregations, and 138 sisters from four congregations. The Maryknoll Congregation supplies the largest number, with 62 priests and 43 sisters.[99] Cardinal Maurer and the minister of religion found words of praise for the Maryknoll Brothers because of their helpful efforts for so many Bolivians in the struggle against illiteracy with the aid of the radio. The Bolivian broadcasting companies form a society which has constructed nine transmitters and is under the direction of these missionaries.[100]

---

[93] AICA 15, 758f. (17 June 1971), 31.
[94] Ibid. 16, 803 (11 May 1972), 23.
[95] Ibid. 17, 810 (29 June 1972), 17f.
[96] Ibid. 18, 8, 893 (31 Jan. 1974), 19.
[97] Ibid. 17, 873 (13 Sept. 1973), 17f.
[98] Ibid. 17, 817 (17 Aug. 1972), 30.

Authentic Justice and Humanization

The Bolivian Commission Justicia y Paz, founded at the beginning of 1973, in view of the situation in the nation condemned in a statement the restriction on freedom of the press and the persecution of the political opponents of the regime. The Bolivian Workers' Central Office is ignored and the unions are manipulated from above. All liberal activities are suppressed, and intrusions are increasing in regard to both democratic institutions and private persons. Injustices are perpetrated against those of different political views, political prisoners live in miserable conditions in the prisons, and deaths by torture take place. Despite many promises, the regime has not thus far stopped these methods.[101]

PERU

Peru has a total of 1,285,215 square kilometers, and according to the 1974 census 13,672,052 inhabitants,[102] of whom two-fifths are Indians and an equal number mestizos. Ca. 75 percent of the population is Catholic.

The Peruvian episcopate consists of fifty-three members, of whom seven are archbishops, twelve residential bishops, four bishops with superdiocesan functions, eight auxiliary bishops, eight vicars apostolic, and fourteen prelacies. The Church provinces are Lima, Huancayo, Piura, Trujillo, Arequipa, Ayacucho, and Cuzco. With the bishops, the retired priests, and the priests outside Peru, Peru numbers 967 diocesan and 1,492 religious priests, altogether then 2,459. In addition, the statistics show 597 religious brothers, 4,395 sisters of contemplative orders, 810 parishes with pastors, and 284 parishes without pastors.

Since 1973 the republic has been divided into eight pastoral regions: the northern mountain chain in the area of Cafamarca; the northern coast in the territory of Trujillo; the central mountain chain in the area of Huancayo; the area of Lima; the central coast in the territory of Ica;

---

[99] Ibid. 17, 831 (23 Nov. 1972), 26f.

[100] Ibid. 18, 833 (22 Nov. 1973), 29f.

[101] SEDOC 6 (Dec. 1973), 741–45.

[102] Basadre, Chile, Perú y Bolivia independientes, 6f.; Anuario eclesiástico del Perú (1974).

southern Peru in the area of Arequipa; the southern Andes in the area of Cuzco; primitive forest in the territory of Pucalipa.[103]

Educational Institutions

Since 1917 Lima has had a Catholic university, which on 30 September 1942 was given the title "papal" by the Holy See and which was recognized by the state as a national university in 1949. The University of San Cristóbal, founded in 1668, continued its work in the twentieth century as an official institute for higher ecclesiastical studies, associated with the papal university. However, only 8 percent of the students in the entire republic attend the Catholic university. More than one hundred schools are run by diocesan or religious priests, more than one hundred fifty by sisters.[104]

The religious-philosophical positivism, which achieved its greatest importance at the Universidad Nacional de San Marcos in the years after 1920, fell for a while under the influence of Bergson. Finally it was supplanted by Marxism when representatives such as José Carlos Mariategui (1895–1930), a figure of great repute in all of Latin America, and the Marxist Victor Raúl Haya de la Torre occupied chairs there. An investigation of opinion in the university sphere—2,101 questioned—revealed that some 20 percent professed themselves to be atheists or "not believers in the Church." In fact, atheism was on the march.[105] As early as 15 June 1939 the Episcopal Conference had complained in an encyclical that "humanitarian" societies were pursuing Communist goals, "socialization" was making progress, as were pornography and divorce; with the aid of the school monopoly "a school without God" was being sought.[106]

The Social Sphere

On 3 October 1968 the troops overthrew President Belaúnde in a coup d'état. Juan Velasco Alvarado formed the new government, which proclaimed land reform in May 1969, an organic law of the Peruvian university in February 1969, and an industrial law in July 1970. This comprehensive revolution forced the Peruvian Church to revise its position. After the publication of the encyclical Populorum progressio, there was formed in March 1968 a group of priests to realize the social apostolates. The so-called group ONIS—Oficina Nacional Información

---

[103] Anuario eclesiástico del Perú (1974).

[104] G. Lohmann Villena, "Perú," New Catholic Encyclopedia XI, 184–92; M. B. Murphy, Pontifical Catholic University of Peru, 193.

[105] Cf. F. Interdonato, S.J., El ateísmo en el mundo actual. Estudio aplicado al Perú, 29, 33, 74–89, 373–76.

[106] Revista de la Universidad católica del Perú VI, 206–19.

Social—often supported the measures taken by the government in favor of a higher social justice.[107] In the decrees of the second meeting in October 1969 it was said: In the planned separation of Church and state no deceptions should be practiced in an effort to retain the existing situation; the agricultural property of dioceses and congregations must not be excluded from the land reform; mentality, attitude, and manner of life must be changed in order to break with the conditions of privilege.[108]

On 2 July 1970 the Permanent Commission of the Peruvian Episcopal Conference published a letter in which the collaboration of the Church in the construction of a better world was made concrete. The bishops admitted that, by their defective loyalty to the Gospel, Christians have contributed to the origin of the present situation, and regarded it as a duty of the Peruvian Church to carry through a revision of all ownership in immovable property and goods of every sort of the dioceses, congregations, and ecclesiastical institutions. The meeting reminded teachers of their great responsibility in education and admonished them to intensify their pastoral action in public and private schools and to cooperate with the state educational authorities.[109]

From 30 April to 2 May 1971 a workers' parish in Lima brought together more than thirteen hundred persons; the invitation proceeded from the laity. Among those invited were representatives of the Movimiento de Trabajadores Cristianos, of Juventud Obrera Católica, of the Unión Nacional de Estudiantes Cathólicos y Movimiento Sacerdotal (ONIS). Seventy study groups worked out several resolutions, including this one: There prevails in the nation an injustice, which especially burdens the lower classes. This situation cannot be accepted by any Christian. The new society must be classless, with community possession of the means of production. The Church must give up its privileged property position, its involvement with the state, and repressive pastoral methods. Therefore, the religious institutes must give up their schools which are reserved to the rich. They desire a Church which supports the oppressed, not the oppressors. They propose to form contemplative and active groups with a coordination committee, to promote works of documentation to prove the oppression of the majority of Peruvians, and finally they claim to form themselves as representatives of the formation of opinion and organs of information in and outside the Church.[110]

---

[107] Christus 410 (July–Dec. 1970), 762; SEDOC 2 (Nov. 1969), 657–60.

[108] SEDOC 2 (May 1970), 1437–40.

[109] Christus 410 (July–Dec. 1970), 762–77.

[110] R. Antoncich, S.J., "Lima: 'Cristianos en un mundo de injusticia.' Primer encuentro por una Iglesia solidaria," Mensaje 200, 307f.

At the conclusion of their forty-second conference at Lima, 19–27 January 1972, the Peruvian bishops published a letter on evangelization and explained the guidelines and aims for the propagation of the faith, even to its introduction in school.[111] At the Roman Synod of Bishops of 1974 Monseñor Durand Flores called attention to the successful work of the pastoral Priests' Councils, in which for five years also religious priests, sisters, and lay persons, as well as representatives of the eight regions, had participated. The chief concern was for the 6 million Indians, whose piety was still mixed with pagan elements. They had to be shown that the external activity, processions, sacraments, and even the Mass, are means of experiencing the state of being God's children.[112] At the Roman Synod the auxiliary bishop of Lima, Schmitz Sauerborn, likewise referred to the Christian tradition of the country; it is important to preserve it by having the Church take an interest in persons and in human rights.[113]

ECUADOR

Ecuador has an area of 283,561 square kilometers and in 1968 had 4,509,768 inhabitants; the Vatican statistics for 1971 give 6,297,000 inhabitants and 5,359,000 Catholics. The country is divided into three ecclesiastical provinces: Cuenca, Guayaquil, and Quito. Cuenca has three suffragans: Azogues, Loja, and Machala. Guayaquil embraces the diocese of Puertoviejo and the prelacy of Los Ríos. To Quito belong the sees of Ambato, Guaranda, Ibarra, Latacunga, Riobamba, and Tulcán. There are five vicariates apostolic: Esmeraldas, Méndez, Napo, Puyo, and Zamora, and three prefectures apostolic: Aguarico, Galápagos, and San Miguel de Sucumbios.[114]

Of the 762 diocesan priests in 1968, 65 percent (432) do pastoral work in the parishes, 11.2 percent (86) are in administration, 4 percent (31) are in superparochial pastoral care, 3.9 percent (31) are active as teachers in seminaries.[115] In the country there are 898 religious priests, who belong to eighteen different institutes. The diocese with the most religious priests is Quito with 287, followed by Guayaquil with 141, Puertoviejo with 41, and Cuenca with 60. Twenty-two percent of the religious priests devote themselves to teaching—37 percent, if one considers those active in seminaries; 22 percent are in parish work, 18 percent are entrusted with other pastoral duties, 17 percent are occupied in administration. The total number of male religious is 1,576, of sisters 3,622. A great many of them are active in schools, headed by the Christian Brothers, the Salesians, and the Jesuits.[116]

---

[111] SEDOC 5 (Dec. 1973), 751–68.

[112] Osservatore Romano, 3 Oct. 1974.

[113] Ibid., 10 Oct. 1974.

[114] La Iglesia en el Ecuador. Estudio del personal de 1968 II/1, Análisis, 1, 12; Annuario Pontificio (1977), 957.

[115] La Iglesia en el Ecuador, ibid., 4, 13.

School System

Eighty percent of Ecuador's schools are public. According to Paragraph 16 of the 1906 constitution the school system is public, free, and lay. In accord with Paragraph 151, 21 (1929), private schools remain under state control. The situation worsened further after the proclamation of totalitarianism (Paragraph 142, 3, [1945]) in education; a year later, in 1946, Marxian totalitarianism was annulled and the right of their own type of education for their children was transferred to the parents. A subsidy of 20 percent of the costs incurred was approved for the lay school which was neither for nor against religion, presupposing that it did not charge fees. From the start, the Church fought laicism and put personnel and financial means at the disposal of the building of its own schools. The pupils of the lay schools, who often came from Christian families, were not regarded in a friendly manner and remained isolated; the teachers often had the feeling of being regarded as traitors. Later the Church organized a pastoral action also outside the school: youth centers, Catholic Action, and so forth, in order to better care for youth living apart from the Church. In recent times the opposition has broken down, and the desire for rapprochement and cooperation has become apparent. The Church makes its contribution through Caritas, social concern, libraries, and direct contact with teachers.[117]

Political and Socioeconomic Position of the Church

The episcopate of Ecuador treated the political and socioeconomic problems of the country through its Permanent Commission in two documents. The point of departure of the first, that of 31 December 1967, was the elections of 2 June 1968. The second document, published at Easter of 1968, produced some guiding principles for the building of a "creative peace." The bishops indicated that in a Church which wants to retain its internal autonomy, the members of the clergy and of religious institutes must renounce political rights and duties which pertain to them as members of the political community in order thereby to hold themselves aloof from party conflicts. They recall the "programmatic statement" of the Ecuadorian episcopate: The Church of Ecuador can in the sense of its permanent function neither identify itself with a political group nor bind itself to a system; no political grouping can claim the quality of a Catholic institution or ecclesiastical authority.[118] In the second document it is stressed that peace demands the unity of all citizens, for the development of all social strata, especially of those of modest means and those standing apart; this is the necessary presupposition for a creative peace.[119] On 20 June 1969 the Episcopal Conference at Baños outlined the function of the priest in the world and gave guidelines for dialogue and coresponsibility with economic life, work, and for celibacy.[120]

---

[116] Ibid., 15–44; Estudio de la viceprovincia del Ecuador III/1: Estudio del personal. Estudio de las residencias y parroquías, 4.

[117] La Iglesia en el Ecuador, ibid., 49.

First National Assembly of Ecuadorian Priests

As the outcome of the first meeting with the participation of ninety-nine priests from almost all dioceses of the country, three bishops, and two foreign priests—from Peru and Bolivia—seven seminarians, and twelve young lay persons, there was published a detailed statement with the following content: crisis of the clergy; collegiality; authority and obedience in the Church; autonomy of the Ecuadorian Church; economic position of the clergy; priestly celibacy; priests and freedom; priests and politics; formation of priests; the priest as a man and the priestly vocation. Obedience means coresponsibility, coparticipation, and dialogue; evangelization represents a liberating message, which interprets in the world the historical process proclaimed by the Holy Spirit. The priest has within the Christian community the right to occupy political positions in harmony with his conscience. An ever more secularized society, which denies a vocation devoted to sanctification, demands that the priest live by a professional work and not by his spiritual ministry, which should be gratis, but this does not prevent priests who exercise only the latter from obtaining the necessities of life from their communities.[121] The bishop of Riobamba, Monseñor Leónidas Proaño Villalba, proposed in a letter of 1969 an ideal program of poverty for the basic renewal of his diocese.[122]

In Search of an Integral Development

The Permanent Committee of the Commission Justicia y Paz of Ecuador complained at the conclusion of the meeting at El Inca of 18–19 December 1970 that the slight economic growth of the preceding years was obtained at the expense of the lower classes of city and country and for the benefit of the upper and middle classes and a certain higher developed working class, and proposed to coordinate all initiatives and private or public programs in order to achieve the desired progress.[123] A meeting of more than one hundred priests in April 1971 accepted the decrees of Medellín and condemned the civil and religious persecution of persons who were engaged in the liberation and renewal of the Church. The priests declared that the Church as a community of faith adheres to the destiny of the human being and sees itself justified in criticizing, in condemning injustice, oppression, and abuse of power, and finally in keeping alive hope as the motivating power of a permanent renewal. Hunger, illiteracy, unemployment, exploitation of workers and peasants, concentration of power in a few hands are the consequences of the capitalism dominant in the country. They concede their cosharing in the capitalistic system if they defend, in the name of God, private ownership of the means of production.[124] Thereupon the Episcopal Conference from 2 to 4 March 1972 elaborated a comprehensive pastoral plan: reevaluation of the person, evangelization and deepening of the faith, role of the visible Church.[125] The government was requested, in regard to the politically suspect, to respect the basic rights of citizens in investigations, and they point out the right of prisoners to come before a nonpartisan court. This attitude results not from political or partisan motives but as a contribution to the welfare of the country.[126]

---

[118] SEDOC 2 (Aug. 1968), 233–38.

[119] Ibid.

[120] Ibid. 2 (Nov. 1969), 669–72.

[121] "Primera convención nacional de presbíteros del Ecuador," Christus 410 (Mexico, July–Dec. 1970), 318–55.

[122] SEDOC 2 (June 1970), 1587–90.

The Church Facing the New Agrarian Law

The bishop of Riobamba, Monseñor Leónidas Proaño Villalba, in a letter of 1974 to the president of the republic analyzed the situation of the peasants in the province of Chimborazo: Of the 400,000 inhabitants of this province, 300,000 are campesinos and 52 percent illiterate. The impoverished areas do not offer the small owner even the most elementary living conditions, and in other areas the latifundia stifle every effort for survival. Monseñor Proaño examines the deficiencies of the new law and offers the cooperation of the Church in applying it.[127]

The Church in the Present

At the 1974 Roman Synod of Bishops the archbishop of Guayaquil, Echevarría Ruíz, made known that a text had been worked out which contained the guidelines of the history of salvation and the method of administering the sacraments. The text was distributed among priests, religious, and catechists in order to assure unity of arguments and of manner of presentation. It was thereby attempted to actualize the theological formation of the clergy. The successes of these initiatives have become visible in small communities, parishes, and at the Eucharistic Congress.[128]

---

[123] Ibid 4 (Sept. 1971), 361–65.

[124] Ibid., 365–69.

[125] Ibid. 5 (Dec. 1972), 747–60.

[126] AICA 17, 842 (18 Feb. 1973), 40f.

[127] Ibid., 18, 900 (21 March 1974), 23f.

Colombia

Colombia covers 1,130,000 square kilometers and has about 24 million inhabitants,[129] of whom 97.5 percent are Catholics.[130] The people of the mountains differ in their religious outlook from those of the lowland, due to geographical and climatic conditions. About 98 percent of the Colombian population inhabits the mountain area, with a higher and more uniform culture. In the country parishes piety is mixed with superstitious concomitants and numerous errors as a consequence of earlier struggles and of the lack of priests.

In 1948 the republic had 1,074 parishes, 2,263 churches and chapels, and 1,642 priests. At that time the seminaries were attended by 560 candidates for the priesthood; in the minor seminaries there were 1,780 pupils. Altogether there were 10,488,669 Catholics. In 1966 4,214 priests were active, of whom 2,632 were diocesan and 1,852 religious; there were 2,221 brothers and 15,086 sisters.[131] In 1971 the Vatican statistics counted 56 ecclesiastical jurisdictions and 1,851 parishes.

Since 1944 Catholic Social Action has been established in urban and rural professional associations. The urban associations are organized in regional societies, such as the Unión de Trabajadores de Antioqua (UTRAN), with seventy unions and more than 30,000 members. The rural professional associations constitute the Federación Agraria Nacional (FANAL), with 400 unions and more than 100,000 members; it publishes an organ for the leading members, the weekly Justicia Social, with a circulation of 300,000, in addition to newspapers and prospectuses. All these urban and rural associations gradually joined the Unión de Trabajadores Colombianos (UTC), which counts more than 300 unions and over 150,000 members. The national Junta for social actions consists of the archbishops of Bogotá, Medellín, Cartagena, and Popayán; they have collaborators on the national and local level.

---

[128] Osservatore Romano, 2 Oct. 1974.

[129] Cf. V. Vives, op. cit. IV/2, 594f.

[130] AICA 17, 852 (19 April 1973), 21f.

[131] Revista Javeriana 57 (Bogotá 1962), 110.

School System

In Antioquia alone—apart from the Pontificia Universidad Bolivariana with 104 professors—there were eleven colleges with 1,537 students, which are run by priests. Altogether 3,932 students in the republic attended institutions of higher learning, which were likewise under priestly management. The statistical handbook of 1948 counts 413 modern secondary schools with 90,787 students and 1,040 public schools with 74,942 pupils, a total of 1,453 schools and 165,724 pupils. It is to be noted that the high schools run by priests and religious institutes are attended by 80 percent of the students in the country. As coordinating element of the private schools there functions the Confederación de Colegios Católicos, which for several years has published an educational periodical.

Colombia has two papal universities: the Pontificia Universidad Javeriana at Bogotá, since 31 July 1939 with faculties of theology, canon law, philosophy, literature, education, law, economic and social sciences, medicine and dentistry, engineering and architecture; the Pontificia Universidad Católica Bolivariana (Medellín), since 10 August 1945 with faculties of law, political and social sciences, economics and business, philosophy and education, literature, engineering, electricity and chemistry, architecture, city-planning and fine arts.[132] Important cultural centers are also the San Bartolomé and Rosario schools in Bogotá, from which have come the most outstanding representatives of the so-called generation of the "Centennial Anniversary." New seminaries arose at Bogotá, Medellín, Manizales, Ibagué, Popayán, Garzón, Barranquilla, and San Gil, which are conducted by priests and religious brothers, especially by Lazarists and Eudists, and accomplish an immense teaching function.

Missions and Missionaries

The Colombian missions embrace extensive areas; geographically considered, more than half the nation is occupied by foreign missionaries; they are mostly Augustinians, Carmelites, Jesuits, and especially Capuchins.

Catholic Initiatives

One of Colombia's most original institutions and at the same time the one with the greatest response in the country is the Workers' Circle and Savings Bank of Father José María Campoamor, who died in 1949; it supports agencies in many cities of the republic. A like importance belongs to the activity of Monseñor Agustín Gutiérrez in the model parish of Fómeque or the Eucharistic Schools of Medellín, founded by the pastor of the San José parish, which on the occasion of the Catechetical Congress at Boston received special honor.

---

[132] Annuario Pontificio (1974), 1371, 1374.

There are three leper stations: Aguas de Dios, Contratación, and Caño de Loro, which are cared for by the Salesians. And the Society of Saint Vincent de Paul is heavily involved in this sphere. According to statistics of 1938, the Church supports 107 social welfare institutions at its own expense. Forty homes for the aged are cared for by religious, but only twenty-eight of them receive state support. Of the eighty orphanages, only nine obtain state help. Nevertheless, the number of welfare institutions increases.[133]

The Voice of the Bishops

Since 1948 we have known the most important problems of the Colombian Church through the episcopal documents. From 20 June to 3 July of that year the Episcopal Conference examined the most pressing problems of the Church and the solutions suited to them in an effort to preserve religion and nation from great dangers. In this connection they elaborated three topics: Communism, "which was, alas, already very deeply rooted," the Church's social teaching, the sole means of loosening the social tensions between capital and labor in the order of mercy and justice, and finally "the most important errors of doctrinaire liberalism" in questions which affect religion.[134] The pastoral letter of 30 November 1951 developed the following themes: the dignity of Christian life; the necessity of religious education; deplorable vices for lack of Christian life; drunkenness; loss of self-esteem by women because of the lack of Christian awareness; Christian life of society, Christian mercy, effects of violence in Colombia.[135] At the beginning of Lent, on 11 February 1955, the bishops explained the position of the Church in regard to unions and condemned the Confederación Nacional de Trabajadores (CNT), whose leaders had from the start repudiated the Church's authority, because it was influenced by socialist tendencies and radiated a Peronist character in the broadest sense. A further topic was Peronist justicialism, condemned by the Church because of its totalitarian claims, and the dangers of socialism.

---

[133] Cf. J. Álvarez Mejiá, S.J., "La Iglesia católica en Colombia," Revista Javeriana 28 (Bogotá 1947), 102–10; E. Ospina, S.J., "Diez años de vida católica en Colombia," Revista Javeriana 30 (Bogotá 1948), 251–61.

[134] F. Velázquez, S.J., "Las direcciones de la conferencia episcopal," Revista Javeriana 30 (Bogotá 1948), 65–68.

[135] "Pastoral colectiva del episcopado colombiano," Revista Javeriana 37 (Bogotá 1952), 3–9.

The bishops were likewise concerned with Colombian socialism and its doctrine: that the goals of society are directed only to material welfare, that the economy should be collectivist. In this connection the bishops again explained the Church's social doctrine.[136] Also the pastoral letter on the occasion of Lent 1958 dealt with the social problems and their solution, based on the papal teachings.[137]

The nineteenth Episcopal Conference at Bogotá in mid-September 1958 in an appeal called upon all Colombian Catholics to practice Christian charity. In the last part and under the title "Practical Applications" they recommended the sincere unity of all Colombians without exception, effective punishment of crimes, moderation in the criticism of political opponents, in both the printed and the spoken word, and true interest in the solution of social problems and the reduction of prices for basic foods as an expression of goodwill by producers and merchants. In addition, they suggested a social reform in regard to the equal distribution of the profit sought, the implementation of savings measures and capital investments in management in order to guarantee full employment and assure cooperation in common projects. The conference published two more instructions: one on a general cultural campaign, the other on the rights of the Church, the state, and the family in education.[138]

Agricultural Reform

The National Congress of Agriculture at Bogotá 24–27 November 1959 treated in two working groups the difficult topic of land reform from the Church's viewpoint: In one there took part representatives of the bishops, clergy, universities, agricultural authorities, and employers; in the other sat representatives of the farmers, small landholders, and tenants, who belonged to various agricultural organizations. There was agreement as to the necessity of assisting the agricultural worker to grow into his role as landowner, just as into the role of father of a family, citizen, or Christian, and to awaken in him the readiness to accept outside help. Two-thirds of the population earn their living from agriculture. According to the statistics of CEPAC there are in Colombia 32 latifundia with a total of more than 480,000 hectares, 120,000 minifundia with only 54,000 hectares, and so on the average hardly two and a half hectares per farm, and a further 268,000 small farms with less than two hectares each. Previously this situation was a good soil for Communist propaganda. The Colombian Church, on the other hand, was always bound by means of its pastors to the rural population. For the farmer the pastor represented the leader, who was followed without hesitation, not only in spiritual but in material affairs. From colonial times, priests were the pioneers in the construction of streets, aqueducts, schools, and hospitals.[139]

---

[136] "El episcopado colombiano condena la CNT. Pastoral colectiva," Revista Javeriana 43 (Bogotá 1955), 129–238.

[137] Revista Javeriana 49 (Bogotá 1958), 37.

[138] Ibid. 50 (Bogotá 1958), 43f.

Communist Infiltration in the University

The twentieth Episcopal Conference at Bogotá in a document examined the national crisis which impaired social life, analyzed its bases, and offered guidelines for a suitable solution. The Church seeks reform of the social structures, but declares at the same time: A true Catholic cannot reconcile the religious attitude with injustice and violence in the social field. Only an integrated Catholic concept, so the announcement says, will overcome the Communist threat. It is not a crust of bread that the Colombian people demand but complete respect for the dignity of the person, integrated by Christ into the unity of the Church.[140] The Episcopal Conference indicated the danger of Communist infiltration into education, especially in the nation's universities.[141]

The Postconciliar Church

In April 1965 the archbishops of the eight most important dioceses of Colombia expressed themselves on the present situation of the nation and the problems which jeopardize the stability of institutions and could lead to anarchy and chaos. The most important causes: the violence prevailing for many years, with many deaths; unemployment and crowding of people in poor lodgings, conditioned by the move of large masses of persons from the countryside to the cities; exaggerated quest for profits; speculation with all goods; attacks on and kidnappings of persons; destroyed families, left in the lurch by the father; obscene films and those that glorify violence and crime; the progress of Communism—supreme danger for religion and country. Peace, say the bishops, is the result of truth, justice, love, and liberty, for which they pray.[142]

---

[139] V. Andrade, S.J., "Es necesario conocer el planteamiento católico de la reforma agraria en Colombia. Primer congreso nacional católico de vida rural (Bogotá 24–27 Nov. 1959). Congreso nacional compesino, 25–28 Nov. 1959," Revista Javeriana 53 (Bogotá 1960), 3–6.

[140] J. Martínez Cárdenas, S.J., "Declaración de la jerarquía," Revista Javeriana 54(Bogotá 1960), 683–86.

[141] "Comunismo en la Universidad de Colombia?" Revista Javeriana 54(Bogotá 1960), 683–86.

[142] "Orientación de la jerarquía," Revista Javeriana 63 (Bogotá 1965), 412–16.

The National Plan for Pastoral Care

Presented in 1966 to the twenty-second Episcopal Conference, it followed the recommendations for pastoral reform of the Second Vatican Council and was approved by the Church of Colombia.[143] Pastoral action had to be extraordinary, thanks to the sacrifice with which it was pushed; uniform, that is, the same solutions for the same problems; planned, that is, with exactly established aims and priorities.[144]

Pastoral Letter to the International Eucharistic Congress

The Colombian bishops issued a pastoral letter to the International Eucharistic Congress at Bogotá of 18–25 August 1968, with the following topical content: In the sense of the congress, which in the light of faith represents an echo of life in the Church renewing itself, and in the spirit of the Second Vatican Council, one must try to construct the genuine Christian community. It will stand at the focal point of all nations and be a way to the unity of men.[145] Shortly before, on 4 May 1968, the twenty-second Episcopal Conference had directed a message to priests.[146]

The Priestly Group of Golconda

The group first met in July 1968 to go more deeply into the encyclical Populorum progressio, and for the second time in December of the same year to discuss the social problems of Colombia. The final document explained its ideological guidelines. The priests regarded their participation in the political life of the nation as a duty of conscience and an exercise of charity in its deepest sense. In the orientations for their activities they rejected the idea of restricting themselves to limiting work which would lose sight of national and international perspectives. Futhermore, they asserted their strict rejection of neocolonial capitalism, which is incapable of solving the problems of their country. A form of society of a socialist stamp is necessary. It should extirpate all types of exploitation of men by men and be in harmony with the historical tendencies of this period and the characteristics of Colombians.[147]

Implementation of the Medellín Decrees

The Episcopal Conference met at the beginning of July 1969 to discuss the application of the decrees of Medellín. Despite the justified desire for change, three positions could be maintained. The first is indifference, in regard to which only one's own interests matter and one acts as though the problems of change do not concern one; this attitude is comfortable, but very dangerous. As a second attitude there is that of the integralists; they desire to preserve everything because everything has a value, the loss of which can be painful; this attitude makes change difficult and intensifies the tensions with the champions of change. Finally, there are the radicals: they are in the front line and irreconcilable; they regard the past as a mere failure and steadfastly proclaim the new order. Amazingly, the conservatives and the radicals often join hands and thus one dogma replaces the other. The Church, on the other hand, which now unconditionally needs a renewal, must live in a permanent process of conversion from the Gospel, and this especially demands an interior reform by each and every member of the Church. The Church is there to serve people. Thus is manifested its desire for change, from immobility to dynamism, the effect of which will be the renewal of the whole person.[148]

---

[143] "El plan pastoral del episcopado colombiano," Revista Javeriana 67 (1967), 321f.

[144] Cf. ibid., 351f.

[145] Cf. SEDOC 2 (Aug. 1968), 225–30.

[146] Ibid. 1 (Oct. 1968), 571–85.

[147] Ibid. 1 (May 1969), 1453–60.

Birth Control

In view of the government's birth control campaign, the Colombian episcopate published a statement on 2 October 1969. In it the problem of family planning is examined. The Church claims the right to interpret natural law and to defend the personal rights of people. The problem of birth control, like every other related to human life, must be considered in the mirror of the human being and his natural and supernatural vocation.[149]

Land Reform and Limitation of Property

The Permanent Commission of the Episcopal Conference in 1971 proposed a land reform and a limitation of the landed property which could belong to one person or one group, including the Church and the state. The declaration was published the day preceding a twenty-four-hour general strike which was proclaimed by the unions to achieve urban and agricultural reforms. Colombia can no longer wait for land reform.[150]

Catholic-Anglican Dialogue

From 9 to 14 February 1971 there took place at Bogotá a meeting between Catholic and Anglican bishops which had been prepared by the ecumenical division of CELAM and the Conferencia Anglicana Latinoamericana (CALA). Ten bishops from each side took part; their aim was an exchange of ideas as well as a better acquaintance. Four themes were to be discussed: Holy Scripture; relations between Catholics and Anglicans in Latin America; authority, office, and sacraments; cooperation in the missions.[151]

---

[148] Ibid. 2 (Nov. 1969), 649–54.

[149] Ibid. 2 (May 1970), 1461–63; cf. Revista Javeriana 68 (Bogotá 1967), 197–209.

[150] AICA 15, 754f. (20 May 1971), 26f.

Social Security for the Clergy

In its last plenary meeting in 1971, the Episcopal Conference unanimously decided to establish social security for the priests. This guarantees almost 3,000 priests against the risks of old age, sickness, and in the case of death.[152]

VENEZUELA

Venezuela is a federal republic with 912,050 square kilometers and 11 million inhabitants, of whom ca. 100,000 are Indians; 94 percent are Catholics. The great natural resources, gold and petroleum, cause an imbalance in the economic structure of the nation, for to the degree that the production of petroleum increases, workmen abandon agriculture; at the same time the cost of living has so grown that as early as 1942 Venezuela was one of the most expensive countries in the world.[153]

Ecclesiastical Organization

From the beginning of the twentieth century the Church of Venezuela has had a considerable lack of priests, caused especially by the suppression of the monasteries in the nineteenth century. The archdiocese of Caracas had capable archbishops: Juan Bautista Castro (1904–15), Felipe Rincón González (1916–46), Lucas Guillermo Castillo (1946–55), Rafael Arías Blanco (1955–56). Castro in particular fostered a better formation of the clergy, spread of devotion to the Eucharist, retreats for men, founding of colleges by religious, systematic spread of catechesis, rearrangement of dioceses by a better common pastoral care, founding of seminaries and new parishes, and improvement of Indian pastoral care. In 1962 the republic had three archdioceses, twelve dioceses, one prelacy nullius, and four vicariates apostolic.[154] In 1975 there were six archdioceses: Caracas, Mérida, Ciudad

---

[151] Ibid. 15, 758f. (17 June 1971), 33–35.

[152] Ibid. 17, 813 (20 July 1972), 31f.

[153] Cf. V. Vives, op. cit. IV/2, 609–12; Maldonado, Anuario católico de Venezuela (1962), 55–65.

[154] V. Iriarte, La arquidiócesis de Caracas de 1900–1966, 365–69; Maldonado, op. cit.

Bolívar, Barquisimeto, Maracaibo, and Valencia; seventeen dioceses and four vicariates apostolic: Caroní, Puerto Ayacucho, Machiques, and Tucupita.[155]

In 1971 there were 798 parishes. Lay organizations consist of, among others, Catholic Action, Catholic Young Workers, the Legion of Mary, The Christian Family Movement, a union of Catholic teachers, a center for film culture; the Opus Dei and the Venezuelan Society of Saint Vincent de Paul are active.[156]

The Catholic university Andrés Bello, founded 25 September 1953, was elevated to a papal university on 29 September 1963. The seminary of Santa Rosa, interdiocesan since 1927, was entrusted to the Jesuits in 1916, but since 19 August 1956 to the Eudists. In the 175 Church schools and 312 colleges 104,414 students were instructed.[157]

In keeping with the motu proprio Ecclesiae Sanctae, a Priests' Council with eighteen members and a Pastoral Council were established on 6 August 1966. Several commissions were incorporated in the Secretariat for Social Action, Education, and Vocations: for liturgy, sacred art, church music, and travel movements, which exercised their activity in sixteen different places; a Secretariat for Church Information with a research center for social and socioreligious questions was added.[158] To make up for the lack of priests, the meeting for the promotion of pastoral vocations, held at Caracas from 14 to 19 April 1967, proposed to the bishops the founding of appropriate centers.[159]

Situation of the Church

The common pastoral letter on the occasion of the nineteenth centenary of the martyrdom of the Apostles Peter and Paul, issued from Caracas on 22 March 1967, describes the real situation of the Church of Venezuela: "Although only a few deny the existence of God, a 'practical' atheism has spread, which consists in forgetting God and every spiritual order, indifference toward the Church, adoration of prosperity as the ultima ratio of life and of the creation of mankind. For not a small number sin is already a meaningless word, for they know no fundamental difference between good and evil." In the effort to adapt oneself to modern thought and with disregard for the Church's magisterium, Christianity is given an arbitrary and fruitless interpretation and thereby uncertainty of faith is created.[160] In a memorandum of the Bureau for Social and Economic Studies of 1967 attention is called to the fact that in 1963 46.3 percent of the newly born were illegitimate, 20 percent of the total population had had no education, the teachers of all grades were uninterested in religion. Pastoral care must conclude especially that Christian social doctrine must be introduced into the seminaries and Catholic universities as an obligatory course.[161]

---

[155] Directorio de la Iglesia católica en Venezuela (1975), 400f.

[156] Ibid., 300–356.

[157] Ibid., 341; Maldonado, op. cit.; Annuario Pontificio 1977, 1404.

[158] V. Iriarte, op. cit. 369.

[159] L.C.; Conclusiones de la I asamblea arquidiocesana de pastoral vocacional. Sic 30, 254–56.

Social Works

The Work for the Protection of the Child (OPAN) was founded in 1948 by Alfonso J. Alfonzo Vaz. There children from ages six to eight were accepted so that they could grow up in a family environment in various units; in 1962 six houses with 120 places were already in operation.[162] The work Fe y Alegría takes care of abandoned children. Established at Caracas in 1955 by a group of university students under the direction of Father José María Vélez, it first worked in the poorest quarters of Caracas, but then spread out to the entire city and its neighborhood, and supports preschools, public and vocational schools, an institute for apprentices with attached schools for secretaries and printers. In the urban quarter Unión de Petare a model center was erected with the following departments: public school with 2,000 pupils, public evening school for adults and youth, children's outpatient department, recreational centers for children and youth, cutting and sewing courses, mess. Similar institutions were established in the interior of the country, at Maracay, Valencia, Barquisimeto, and Maracaibo, and outside the republic in El Salvador, Nicaragua, Panama, Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia.[163]

Care of Souls

A special importance pertains to the Episcopal Conference of 27 August to 5 September 1970. One priest from each diocese and representatives of religious institutes took part in the discussions. Important themes were: mixed marriages; definitive rejection of drugs; education of priests in seminaries with special attention to a formation of future priests that is close to reality, which should be assured by practical activity in various professions. A sign of the changed times was the participation of sixty priests from other dioceses, who arrived without invitation in order to express their partly different opinion on important questions. Thus the Church must take a greater stand for the liberation of the people and declericalize itself, that is, understand the episcopal and priestly office as a service and grant the laity a cooperation in the direction of the Church. They proposed to the episcopate a permanent dialogue, because they felt themselves to be the Church and coresponsible for its mission.[164] Previously, on 19 July 1969, the Venezuelan episcopate had sent a letter to the priests on the model of the priest. The bishops asserted that hitherto in Venezuela there had been no internal confrontations as elsewhere. On the question of celibacy they noted: The general priesthood of the baptized differs not only in degree but essentially from the priesthood of orders, whose sacramental character unites it with the High Priest Christ, the Head. It is a baseless supposition that the ecclesiastical law of celibacy will be changed or abolished.[165] Seventy-five priests replied to this letter that in fact hitherto there have been no open confrontations in the clergy on the function of the Church, but this does not mean that the situation in Venezuela does not contradict the spirit of the Gospel. The clergy must be desacralized and cease to feel themselves a privileged class. In regard to celibacy it is primarily a question why and how the priest can act theocentrically and at the same time anthropocentrically. With appeal to the words of Pope Paul VI and of the Congress of Medellín, these priests stated: "If we do not henceforth share in the process of social liberation, all else is of no use." The Church of Venezuela carries out no evangelization of the poor, because it is closely connected with power and wealth, it does not evangelize the rich in order not to explain to them the demands of the Gospel. Even more: It supplies no proof that it is a Church in the service, first, of the poor and then of all others.[166] The pastoral plan provides for the evangelization of ca. 100,000 Indians, who for the most part live in the prelacy of San Fernando de Apure and in the vicariates of El Caroní, Machiques, Puerto Ayacucho, and Tucupita. The mission of the Spanish Capuchins at Santa Teresita de Cavanayen possesses a model character.[167]

---

[160] XIX centenario del martirio de los apóstoles Pedro y Pablo. Carta pastoral colectiva. Sic 30, 261–63.

[161] Síntesis sociales elaboradas por el CIAS. Informe sobre la realidad de Venezuela, Sic 30, 371–80.

[162] Maldonado, op. cit., 101.

[163] Ibid., 100f.; AICA 17(1972), 817, 25–27, 29.

As the archbishop of Maracaibo, Roa Pérez, reported at the 1974 Roman Synod of Bishops, small charismatic groups, consisting mostly of young people, make themselves noted in Venezuela, who stand in opposition to the ecclesiastical authority, and in the clergy there is also Marxist influence. Catechetical instruction is unsatisfactory. The state school allows religious instruction, but not in the schools which teach higher levels than the minimum requirements of compulsory school attendance.[168]

---

[164] J. I. Arrieta, La conferencia episcopal nacional I: Ambiente de la conferencia, II: Tematíca de la conferencia, Sic 33, 348–51.

[165] SEDOC 2 (May 1970), 1448–52; Christus 410, 794f.

[166] SEDOC 2, 1453–60; Christus 410, 795–808; cf. also SEDOC 4, 1013–18.

[167] Maldonado, op. cit., 490; AICA 17, 809, 12f.

CUBA

Cuba has a total area of 114,500 square kilometers and in 1968 had a population of 4,315,000 urban inhabitants and 3,759,100 rural dwellers. According to the 1970 statistics, the population reached 8,553,385, of whom 70 percent are white, 12.4 percent black, and 17.3 percent mulattoes; 3,819,000 were Catholics in 1977.

From 1940 to 1944 Fulgencio Batista was president of the republic; he pursued a policy that favored the workers. In 1944 he was succeeded by Ramón Grau San Martín. After several uprisings Batista became president again in 1952, until he was overthrown by the revolution of Fidel Castro. On 1 January 1959 Oswaldo Dorticós Torrado was sworn in as president, but in reality Fidel Castro decided policy. The agricultural reform and the economic quarrel with the United States brought about the rapprochement of Castro with the Soviet Union, sealed with the defense pact of September 1962. The economic blockade imposed by the United States would almost have led to a military confrontation, had not the Soviet Union withdrawn from the island. The Cuban opposition and the danger of international measures of boycott forced Castro to tone down his policy. On 1 January 1961 Cuba was declared a socialist republic.[169]

Ecclesiastical Structure

Cuba has two archdioceses: San Cristóbal de la Habana, with the suffragan sees of Matanzas and Pinar del Río, and Santiago de Cuba, with the suffragans of Camagvey and Cienfuegos-Santa Clara.[170] In 1971 there were on the island 228 parishes, but only 208 priests, which means more than 41,000 inhabitants per priest. Of the 208 priests 112 were from orders or congregations, and of these there are 21 Jesuits, 18 members of Foreign Mission Society of the Province of Quebec, 15 Franciscans, 20 Capuchins, besides Carmelites, Passionists, Dominicans, Salesians, Christian Brothers, and Claretians. These 112 religious priests care for a total of 577 parishes, churches of religious and chapels, and 285 pastoral stations. They also work in the diocesan curias, on episcopal commissions, and in other institutions; 58 of them are active in the archdiocese of Habana and the capital city. In addition, there are 236 sisters from fifteen congregations; most strongly represented among them are the Sisters of Mercy with 76 members.[171]

---

[168] Osservatore Romano, 2 Oct. 1974.

[169] Cf. G. Bleiberg, ed., Diccionario de Historia de España. Cuba en el siglo XX I, 2d ed. (Madrid 1968), 1049f.

[170] Annuario Pontificio (1977), 952.

Pastoral Letter of the Bishops

In view of the problematic situation in Cuba the episcopate on 7 August 1960 published a common pastoral letter with the following content: The Church has always joyfully taken note of all those measures which make a contribution to the improvement of the level of life. In this connection it has noted with satisfaction for a year that a land reform is planned, which provides compensation for the owners and enables many workers to take into their own possession the acres worked by them. There is word of great industrial plans, which would not disturb private industry, with the intention of creating many new places for work for the struggle against unemployment. It was stated that the authorities were working to lower the cost of living and to raise the income of families. New hospitals, schools, and social lodgings were to be built, and not least of all it was desired to take up the fight to restore the public finances. The social reforms, to the extent that they aimed, with respect for human rights, to improve the economic, cultural, and social situation of those of moderate means, would have the support of the Church. A reason for anxiety for the bishops was, however, the continued progress of Communism, the acceptance of intimate economic, cultural, and diplomatic relations with the most important Communist countries, and the fact that journalists, politicians, union leaders, and even personalities of the government had often sung the praise of the social order of these countries. If one proceeds from the fact that Communism and Catholicism are mortal enemies, one must definitely condemn Communism, which in one way or another destroys human rights.[172]

The Economic Situation of the Cuban Church

In an open letter of 4 December 1960 to Fidel Castro the bishops explained the economic situation of the Church in Cuba: publication of revolutionary texts with clearly Marxist tendency; arrest of several priests who had read the bishops' letter of 7 August 1960 in the churches; antireligious campaign on the national level with increasing use of force; mass rallies with the approval of the authorities, at which priests were reviled; insulting of the bishops and of Catholic institutions by representatives of quasi-Catholic associations, who try to fight the Church's leadership. The letter enumerates various events of this campaign against the Church; the bishops hope that the government will take the necessary measures to stop the constant attacks against Catholics.[173]

---

[171] "Almanaque de Caridad. Directorio eclesiástico de Cuba 1971," AICA, 16, 788 (27 Jan. 1972), 33–35.

[172] Revista Javeriana 55 (Bogotá 1961), 99–102.

The archbishop of Santiago de Cuba gave to his pastoral letter of February 1961 the heading: "With Christ or Against Christ." In all openness he said: "For us at this moment the hour of fear is past—in case it ever existed at all. We are fighting Communism—we still say it—not for counterrevolutionary, partisan political, economic, or social reasons. We are fighting it because we know that we thereby display a positive service as we fulfill a holy duty. It is a fight for life or death, between Christ and Antichrist. And so each must choose his leader. As regards Catholics, they must know that the hour to prove our power of resistance and our readiness to fight has come. If God is for us, says Saint Paul, who can overcome us? Your will be done, O Lord! May he give us the peace that is based on truth and justice." Thus ended the letter and with it also a section of history.[174] The Church of Cuba will for the future be a Church of silence.

The Persecuted Church

Only the most important events will be mentioned. The date 1 May 1961 was abundant in expressions and deeds of the government against the Church. In his speech Fidel Castro accused the "Falangist" clergy of having taken part in the frustrated invasion of the island at the Bay of Pigs and made known that as a countermeasure the Spanish and other foreign priests would be expelled from the country, their property confiscated, and religious instruction approved only in churches. The press later reported that this order had as its consequence the emigration of hundreds of priests, brothers, and sisters to other countries. Of the then 730 priests on the island, only the approximately eighty Cubans could remain to care for 6.5 million persons. The bishops, who called for a land reform, saw their demands partly fulfilled by the reform of 1959. For the implementation of a reform of education they organized a mass demonstration in Havana at the end of 1959. Toward the end of 1961 Father Germán Lence, born a Cuban and leader of a Catholic society, caused a great stir in the capital when in sermons and lectures he violently attacked the Cuban bishops and praised the Cuban revolution. It is not surprising that Fidel Castro publicly praised him in a speech of 27 November 1960 before the University of Havana. Lence was later suspended a divinis. In March 1961 a bombing attempt occurred at the Nobel Academy in La Víbora, the Old City quarter of Havana, in which a few professors and students were injured. The explosive charge was probably set by collaborators of the government in order to be able to develop a press campaign against the priests, which then actually took place. This affair entered history under the title "Revolution of 2 March." The daily Combate designated it on 8 May 1960 as an internationally planned campaign, that more than 2,000 priests and religious had applied for permission to emigrate; in this regard it was ignored that in a speech of 1 May 1960 Fidel Castro had announced their expulsion from the island. Spokesmen of the government stated that an anti-Communist was also a counterrevolutionary. Thus in Cuba the Church lives in a permanent state of persecution.[175]

---

[173] Ibid., 103–6.

[174] Ibid., 107–11.

The Standpoint of the Bishops

In March 1969 the Cuban bishops had translated into practical guidelines of renewal the results of the second plenary assembly of the Latin American episcopate. At their meeting in April of the same year they chose as the topic of discussion Pope Paul VI's opening address at the Congress of Medellín of 1968; they were aware of being the conduit of the papal pronouncements. On 10 April 1969 they published the papal speech in Havana. They adhered to the recommendation of the Pope, who in his talk described as follows the attitude of the Christian in a suffering world struggling for its further development: "We must advance the deep, foreseeable transformation which is necessary in many areas of our present society, as we love more and learn to love; we must do this with judicious energy, with perseverance and confidence in people, and with the assurance of the faith in the help of God and the power of the good."[176]

At the close of their meeting of September 1969 the Cuban bishops issued a statement with the following themes: problem of faith; analysis of faith; present-day atheism; deficient expressions of faith; growth of faith; liturgy; bible; catechesis; ways to faith. "This is the hour in which we must discover the presence of God among us; it is a question of proving our maturity and not of a death struggle. Maturity and growth mean to let something die in order to gain new knowledge. Hence an hour in which, surrounded by snobbery or extreme deviation and human sin, the desire for justice and authenticity of human relations grows on the personal level among the various social groups and in the sphere of international relations." As sheperds in the service of the Cuban Church, the bishops encouraged their faithful to keep alive their love of Christ in this national situation, unprecedented in Latin America. They expressed their hope that they may find in this situation the means which are suited to show their brothers the way to God.[177]

---

[175] "Cuba: La Iglesia católica y Fidel Castro," Revista Javeriana 55, 278–92.

[176] SEDOC 2 (Sept. 1969), 347–52.

Decrease of the Cuban Clergy

In the last years the number of Cuban priests has dropped by more than 10 percent. In 1969 there were ca. 215, in 1970 202, in 1971 only 193, although 15 priests were ordained in this year. This decrease must be referred to cases of death—the average age is sixty-seven—and emigration. Those priests who leave the country are foreigners—60 percent of the priests in the country are of foreign ancestry. The reasons for leaving are age, sickness, or the ending of their obligation in Cuba. The losses through return to the lay state are minimal in Cuba. Almost the only activity still allowed to the Cuban priest is the care of the churches. The government has formally promised to admit a few Cuban priests who have studied abroad and foreign priests who want to work in Cuba. But, as of 1974, hence, in practical terms, today, this promise has not yet been kept. In 1972 there were 58 Cuban seminarians and some candidates for the priesthood; but this number is inadequate in the long run to make up for the losses of the last years.[178]

THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

The Dominican Republic on the island of Santo Domingo has an area of 48,442 square kilometers and ca. 4.4 million inhabitants. It includes the archdiocese of Santo Domingo and the dioceses of Barahona, La Vega, Nuestra Señora de la Altagracia de Higüey, San Juan de la Maguana, and Santiago de los Caballeros. In the coordination of the national pastoral care there is collaboration among the commissions for liturgy, means of communication, religious education, charity, social action (Iustitia et pax), lay apostolate, vocations, seminaries, religious institutes and missions, legal and concordat affairs, the national secretariat for community pastoral care, the Dominican Conference for Religious, the Dominican Caritas, and the National Association of Catholic Schools.[179]

---

[177] Ibid. 2 (June 1970), 1581–88.

[178] AICA, 16, 803 (11 May 1972), 23f.

[179] Annuario Pontificio (1977), 953; Directorio de la Iglesia católica en República Dominicana (1972), 8–12.

The archdiocese of Santo Domingo had in the census of 1970 in an area of 8,007.72 square kilometers 1,374,939 inhabitants, with 100 parishes, which were attended to by 40 priests and 181 religious. Eighteen institutes of men and 34 of women worked in the field of pastoral care in parishes, schools, high schools, academies, and other institutions. The archdiocese has 3 universities, 56 elementary schools, and 13 high schools. Health institutions number 17 hospitals and 1 leprosarium. To the archdiocese belong 215 priests and 65 assistants.

The other dioceses display a similar structure. Santiago de los Caballeros has, with 11,003.41 square kilometers and 1,047,683 inhabitants, 38 parishes, 35 priests, 66 religious priests, 32 brothers, and 257 sisters. In addition, there are in the diocese 10 institutes of men and 15 of women. The diocese has the Catholic university Madre y Maestra, the school for the humanities Arzobispo Merino, and the minor seminary San Pio X, and 23 schools. The diocese of Vega has, with 8,142.73 square kilometers and 751,620 inhabitants, 36 parishes, 24 priests, and 58 religious priests, 7 institutes of men and 11 of women, and 20 schools. The diocese of San Juan de la Maguana has, with 15,165.25 square kilometers and 560,086 inhabitants, 19 parishes, 3 priests, and 31 religious priests, 6 institutes of men and 12 of women, and 10 schools. The diocese of Nuestra Señora de la Altragracia has, with 6,614.37 square kilometers and 276,930 inhabitants, 13 parishes, 11 priests, and 7 religious priests.[180]

The Concordat between the Holy See and the Dominican Republic

The concordat was signed in Vatican City on 16 June 1954. The essential agreements are as follows, in the words of the text: Paragraph 1: "The Catholic, apostolic, and Roman religion remains the religion of the Dominican nation." Paragraph 3: "The Holy See is empowered to proclaim and publish all directives affecting the Church; furthermore, to be in contact with prelates, clergy, and faithful of the nation, and vice versa." Paragraph 9: "The erection, modification, or suppression of parishes, benefices, and ecclesiastical offices . . . are subject to the ecclesiastical authority, in accord with the canon law." Paragraph 11: "Ecclesiastical persons cannot be interrogated by judges or other officials in regard to deeds and facts which have been made known to them under the seal of Confession." Paragraph 15: "The Dominican Republic recognizes full civil rights of those marriages which are contracted in accord with the canon law." Paragraph 19: "The Church may establish seminaries or other educational institutions without restriction; their internal structure is not and cannot be infringed upon by the state. The titles granted in them have the same validity as those granted in state institutions." Paragraph 21: "The Dominican state guarantees to the Catholic Church full liberty to found and maintain under its direction schools of every type. Because of the social gain for the nation the state will support them materially. Religious instruction in these schools is organized and imparted by the Church. The instruction provided by the state in the public schools will be oriented to the principles of Catholic doctrine and morality."[181]

---

[180] Directorio de la Iglesia catolica en República Dominicana, 13–170.

The Church in Public Life

Monseñor Juan Félix Pepén y Solimán, bishop of Higüey, in 1968 published a pastoral letter with an appeal to the consciousness of all that the situation of the propertyless farmer be investigated and a reform in accord with the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes be set in motion. Against the strong criticism that at once appeared, the clergy took its place at the bishop's side.[182]

In July 1969 the Dominican government refused to grant a visa to Fathers Sergio Figueredo, S.J., and Graciano Varona, O.S.B. In spite of the intervention of the nuncio and the bishops, the government persisted in its attitude; this caused the Jesuits to make known their attitude to the case. They testified to Father Figueredo's loyalty to the norms and spirit of the Church in his activity. "Our attitude," said the Jesuits, "is that of service; it is based on the Gospel and on the teaching of the Church, has no partisan political relationship, and is free from the exercise of any sort of pressure in the area of civilian life; it will challenge only the personal and common consciousness. We are ready to carry out this renewal entirely as proof of our service to the People of God in the Dominican Republic."[183]

Cardinal Octavio Antonio Beras Rojas, archbishop of Santo Domingo, thus presented the ecclesiastical situation in the republic at the 1974 Roman Synod of Bishops: The courses for the preparation for baptism and marriage have experienced a great upsurge. Since great importance pertains to the problem of "Liberation" as expression of the Christian purpose, two types of pastoral activity have been started: by the first the sense of human brotherhood and the state of being children of God is awakened, by the second "Liberation" is recommended which makes the Church more credible and the presence of God in society more clearly evident. In order to intensify the participation of the laity in evangelization and thereby to alleviate the lack of priests, the "assemblies of presidents" have been called into being. The bishop expressly entrusts prepared lay persons with the function "of organizing an assembly and presiding over it." In this connection they should explain the Word of God, administer Communion, and, if they are qualified, take care of the spiritual and material welfare of the congregations and bring the Eucharist to the sick. The president, who is supported by a council, can be single or married, but he must display a definite maturity, be a practicing Catholic, have adequate financial means, obtain the consent of the congregation, and prepare himself in catechetical programs of a total of 280 hours. This new institution has produced better results than the diaconate of married persons. The meeting of families, taking place twice a month, has also had good results; they are under the direction of a well-prepared moderator. A national institute annually decides the program and gives directions and guidelines for implementation.[184]

---

[181] Estudios 469, 40–44.

[182] Sic 32, 188–94.

[183] SEDOC 3, 361–64.

PANAMA

Panama has a total area of 75,650 square kilometers and ca. 1.5 million inhabitants, of whom 18 percent are Creoles, 10 percent Indians, 52 percent mestizos, 15 percent blacks, and 5 percent mulattos; in 1971 85.5 percent were Catholics.

The Situation of the Church

The nation embraces the archdiocese of Panama, the dioceses of Chitré, David, Santiago de Veraguas, the prelacy of Bocas del Toro, and the vicariate apostolic of Darién.[185] In 1971 there were 102 parishes. The recruitment for the priesthood has inadequate results: from 1940 to 1950 seven priests were ordained, from 1951 to 1960 eleven, and from 1961 to 1964 three. Religious vocations are also rare. Of the 148 religious priests on hand in 1967, the majority were foreigners; the same is true of the 53 assistants and of the 364 sisters. Private educational institutions are usually in the hands of religious.[186]

The following are active on the national level: Catholic Action; the Association of Catholic Women with houses throughout the country; the Christian Family Movement; the Catechetical School, which takes care of the formation of teachers in religious instruction; the Marian Congregation Stella Maris; the Secretariat for Social Courses. The Catholic Center of Education is the focal point of all apostolic endeavors. Also to be named are: the papal missionary works; the Secretariat for the Christian Faith with 62 centers in Chiriqui, 62 in Santiago, and 64 in Panama; the Catholic Work for Emigrants; and Radio Hogar.[187]

---

[184] Osservatore Romano, 2 Oct. 1974.

[185] Annuario Pontificio (1977), 953; Anuario eclesiástico de Panamá (1965), 18–36, 129–70.

[186] The statistics on the clergy of the individual areas of jurisdiction in Anuario eclesiástico de Panamá (1965), 23–62.

Social Revaluation

Following its meeting of 19 to 21 February 1968 at Colón, the episcopate proclaimed the decrees enacted, which dealt with the social situation in the nation, and announced a national synod with participation of the laity at the end of the year. The bishops designated as incompatible with the Church's social doctrine the fact of the concentration of landed property in a few hands, while the majority of the rural population lives in poverty. Christians who are economically well-off are reminded that the faith must express itself in deeds. Workers and peasants are encouraged to use their scanty means for the education of their children and to give up unnecessary expenses. With a reference to the impending election fight, the bishops indicated the danger that, because of accusations made by the one side or the other, families could be torn apart. Those responsible for the means of communication—press, radio, television—were reminded by the bishops of their responsibility, which demanded that they maintain objectivity in their presentation of events, despite personal views. They also called attention to the fact that Christian festivals are not suitable occasions for political activities.[188]

Religious Life in Central America and Panama

The bishops of Central America and Panama organized the first meeting for reflection at Panama from 16 to 20 March 1970. At it the following topics were treated: lack of priestly vocations; renewal and adaptation of the religious life; lack of superiors in the mostly native congregations; tensions between native and foreign priests; demands of sisters for more autonomy in the solving of their problems; apathy in regard to the National Conference of the Orders, especially on the part of the men.[189]

Arrest and Expulsion of Father Luis Medrano, S.J.

On the occasion of the arrest and expulsion of Father Luis Medrano, S.J., director of Radio Hogar in Panama City, Monseñor Marcos Gregorio McGrath, C.S.C., archbishop of Panama, in the course of a

---

[187] Ibid., 56–62.

[188] SEDOC 2 (Aug. 1968), 237–40.

[189] Ibid. 3 (Sept. 1970), 347–54.

Mass carried on television, delivered a talk which dealt with this occurrence. He presented the expulsion of Medrano as a sign of the abolition of free speech in Panama and claimed for the Church the freedom which its function required. The hard truth was, he said, that often in a democracy the rights of all become the privileges of the few; these few prevent necessary reforms by exercising their political and economic power. The Church openly expresses itself for a development favoring all persons and claims for every person a minimum of freedom of opinion, the inviolability of his home, and "a fair trial in case of arrest."[190]

The Church and Reform of the National Constitution

In view of the announced reform of the constitution, the bishops on 27 June 1972 issued a decision in behalf of the human values anchored in the constitution. They pointed out that the majority of the population—natives, peasants, and recipients of social support—must be taken into consideration. They constituted the majority, and this majority demanded priority. They must obtain the possibility of participating in political life, use the institutions of health care and education, and acquire jobs. Paragraph 36 of the now valid constitution recognizes the Catholic religion as the religion of the majority of the population; the Catholic religion is taught in the schools. The participation of the pupils in acts of worship is not a duty if such is so desired by the parents or their representatives. This regulation is regarded by the bishops as a recognition of the Church within the national structure.[191]

After nine months of silence Archbishop Marcos Gregorio McGrath delivered an address on 23 August 1972 on the occasion of a protest Mass which had been organized by a lay group to proclaim their sympathy with the Archbishop, who had become the target of a defamatory press campaign. He had been charged with being too intellectual, too indecisive, not a Panamanian, a friend of politicians and the wealthy, and an enemy of the regime; he was a bishop for councils and for conferences at Medellín. The archbishop took a position on all these points as follows: "I ask all my priestly brothers, the cooperating laity, and all others to have understanding and pardon for my mistakes; for my part, I try to understand and forgive those of the others, although I do not always succeed. They are my real brothers."[192]

---

[190] Ibid., 361–64.

[191] Ibid. 5 (Jan. 1973), 875–80.

[192] Ibid., 880–88.

NICARAGUA

The Republic of Nicaragua has a total area of 139,000 square kilometers and 1.8 million inhabitants, that is, about twelve inhabitants per square kilometer; 17 percent are Creoles, 5 percent Indians, 9 percent blacks, and 70 percent mestizos. Other sources list 7 percent Creoles, 50 percent mestizos, and about 33 percent Indians. The most important products are coffee, cotton, and bananas. The country depends on agriculture.[193] By the bull Quam iuxta of 2 December 1913, Pius X detached Nicaragua from the archdiocese of Guatemala and established the new ecclesiastical province of Nicaragua. At present the archdiocese of Managua has as suffragans Estelí, Granada, León, and Matagalpa, the prelacy of Juigalpa, and the vicariate apostolic of Bluefields.[194]

Apostolic Activities

Several institutions take part in national pastoral care: the Episcopal Conference, the national seminary, the work for ecclesiastical vocations, the friends of the seminary, the papal missionary works, the Conference of the Religious of Nicaragua (CONFER), the Christian Family Movement, the means of social communication, including the Catholic Radio of Nicaragua and the broadcasting schools.

The most important cultural institutions are the Central American University, founded in 1961 and run by the Jesuits, with faculties of law, humanities, education, engineering, economics, veterinary science and zoological technique, and with the institute Mater Ecclesiae for religious culture.

According to the statistical handbook of 1967 there were in the republic 13 institutes of male religious and the Christian Brothers, 20 of female religious, who display their activity in parishes, chapels, schools, social works, outpatient departments, and hospitals. The other six jurisdictional areas have between 9 and 21 parishes and a corresponding school system.[195]

National Constitution

Since the Constituent Assembly was dominated by a radical group, there went into effect on 14 April 1939 a new constitution in which the name of God did not appear. The state has no official religion; the laicized school is institutionalized in the educational institutions operated by the state and the communes. The avowedly Catholic country expressed itself in favor of the private schools of religious, in which the number of pupils grew rapidly; even the opponents sent their children to these schools. The best known schools in the country are the Colegio Centroamericano del Sagrado Corazón de Jesús, run by the Jesuits, and the Instituto Pedagógico de Varones under the direction of the Christian Brothers; both are in Managua.[196]

---

[193] Cf. Diccionario de historia de Espana. Nicaragua (Época independiente) III, 2d ed. (ed. by G. Bleiberg) (Madrid 1969), 38–41.

[194] Annuario Pontificio (1977), 953: Anuario eclesiástico de Nicaragua (1967), 15.

[195] Anuario eclesiástico de Nicaragua (1967), 19–25.

Activity of the Church

In a pastoral letter of 19 February 1972 to priests, faithful, and fellow citizens, the bishops note that the Church itself has a message to deliver on the political stage, for the subject of politics is the person with all his rights and duties, which must be protected. The bishops want the political field of activity of the Church and the function of the bishops and priesthood "to work for the aim of peace and justice with all means which are in harmony with the Gospel," to be understood as a contribution to the establishing of a just order, especially where the human problems are the most difficult. The Church, say the bishops, proposes principles which proceed from the faith, advocates a change of structures and ideas, and expresses itself for bold innovations and a more just order. The bishops demand for every citizen the possibility of free decision, without fear of reprisal and a guaranteed legal protection for everyone. They further support the forming of associations, unions, and so forth, and free political elections in canton and community. These demands are unconditional, if a better world is to be built.[197]

HONDURAS

The Republic of Honduras has, according to the situation in 1972, a total area of 116,160 square kilometers and 2,975,985 inhabitants, of whom 2,440,000 were Catholics in 1971. Ecclesiastical Division: the archdiocese of Tegucigalpa with the diocese of Comayagua, San Pedro Sula, Santa Rosa de Copán, and the prelacies of Choluteca and Inmaculada Concepción de la B.V.M. in Olancho. The archdiocese of Tegucigalpa has 3 districts and 37 parishes with 17 native and 25 foreign priests and 52 religious brothers; the diocese of Santa Rosa de Copán has 25 parishes, 4 vicariates, and 4 chapels, cared for by a small number of priests; the diocese of San Pedro Sula has 16 parishes with attached chapels and about 40 priests; the diocese of Comayagua has 10 parishes with 15 priests. The prelacy of Choluteca counts 16 parishes with about 40 priests, the diocese of Olancho has 7 parishes with 22 priests. The religious brothers in charge of parishes, chapels, and schools, and the sisters for schools and the welfare institutions are distributed throughout the nation.[198]

---

[196] Revista Javeriana 13 (1940), 301f.

[197] Christus 446 (Jan. 1973), 46–50; SEDOC 5 (Nov. 1972), 606–14; SEDOC 6 (Oct. 1973), 493–500.

The Caritas of Honduras devotes itself to several tasks: to awaken the self-consciousness of the poor person, to investigate his real situation and the causes impeding the development of his personality; to give impetus and be concerned with community tasks by the inclusion of new forms of cooperation. Social care is an ingredient of pastoral care: direct help for the lower classes; resocialization and incorporation into the community; support in local and national concerns, in the event of natural catastrophes or similar emergencies.[199]

The broadcasting station at Suyapa is a national institution of private character with the goal of awakening among the rural population and later among the urban people the consciousness of the person in society. Every individual should understand his role as a member in the family and in society at all levels. The aims of this cultural communication do not consist in learning to read, write, and reckon and to acquire basic knowledge of religion or hygiene, but to bring the peasants to an awareness of their own possibilities and to take an active part in the development process of society, Church, and nation. The solution of this educational task is of decisive importance. The courses on Christian doctrine attract collaborators for pastoral work. The Coordinating Council supervises the methodical activity, organizes technical studies, and exerts itself for the financing. The catechetical center, which deals with the formation of catechists, provides the necessary didactic and informative material. The Christian Family Movement seeks to bring families together in order to emphasize the human and Christian values of the family. Lay persons are trained to promote a knowledge of the Bible in the basic communities with reference to the current situation of the Church. To support the maturing of youth, the Church encourages scout movements. The Legion of Mary supports pastoral tasks.[200]

The Voice of the Bishops

In a message of 4 September 1969 to the people, the bishops expressed themselves in regard to the national situation: "The painful events in our homeland compel us to reflect on them and become active. No one is free of guilt in the social injustices, the lack of respect for human dignity and of personal liberty. It is the duty of all citizens to cooperate in the rebuilding of the country in all fields and without hatred, for every time there is hatred self-destruction is caused." The bishops sent an appeal to journalists and radio announcers to adopt and disseminate these guidelines.[201]

---

[198] Annuario Pontificio (1977), 953; Anuario de la Iglesia de Honduras (1973), 3–6.
[199] Anuario de la Iglesia de Honduras (1971).
[200] Ibid.

Land Occupation

In October and November 1969 19,000 farmers occupied the great landed estates in southern Honduras. A group of owners demanded an opinion from the Church. The bishop of Choluteca recognized the difficult problem of the case and the far-reaching social impact; but he wanted neither to approve nor condemn the land occupation. "Acts of violence should not be the means of confrontation among people," the bishop quoted Pope Paul VI after the latter's visit to Africa, "but understanding and love; it must no longer be said: Man against man, but man for men and with men."[202]

On 8 January 1970 the Episcopal Conference reiterated that the Church, in addition to its most important task of being concerned with the redemption of souls, must at the same time care for the human interests of daily life. Very profoundly affected by the misery of some parts of the population because of war, floods, land occupation, violence, or poverty, the bishops explained their own ideas on the present social situation in the country.[203] In view of the situation in agriculture, made more acute by new land occupations, the episcopate in 1972 took a stand in regard to proclamations making the Church responsible for this situation. The Church recognizes, theoretically and practically, private property, but also the necessity that possession be distributed to all social classes. The Church can never approve force, for this is not a human or Christian solution. It supports no political party, not even the Christian Democrats, as some think, and allows no different treatment of native and foreign priests.[204]

EL SALVADOR

El Salvador has a total area of 21,146.08 square kilometers and, according to the census of October 1970, 3,480,281 inhabitants. The average number of inhabitants amounts to 58.8 inhabitants per square kilometer. About two-thirds of the population live in rural areas.

The republic includes the archdiocese of San Salvador and the dioceses of San Miguel, Santa Ana, Santiago de María, and San

---

[201] SEDOC 2 (Jan. 1972), 926–28.

[202] Ibid. 2 (June 1970, 1595–98.

[203] Ibid. 3 (Feb. 1971),1007–13.

[204] Ibid. 5 (Jan. 1973), 887f.

Vicente.[205] According to the statistics of 1969 there are in the nation 200 parishes with an average of 17,402 inhabitants per parish, 219 diocesan priests, and 218 religious priests. The archdiocese of San Salvador and the diocese of San Vicente are relatively better equipped with parishes and priests than the other dioceses. Of the 437 priests, 226 were born in El Salvador—189 diocesan and 37 religious—hence 52 percent. In 1970 only 31 seminarians were studying theology and 91 philosophy. Priestly vocations drop constantly. The nation has an annual population growth of ca. 120,000. In order to maintain the present ratio of ca. 8,000 inhabitants per priest, fifteen new priests would be necessary every year; but at the moment only eight entered upon their office.

Religious cooperate in pastoral work; so too do lay persons, who exercise such activity in educational institutions throughout the country. Altogether, 29 institutes of women with 641 sisters, 127 students, 31 novices, and 10 postulants are active; together with the male institutes they care for the majority of the private educational institutions and all types of welfare institutions. The fact that a large number of marriages were not contracted in church must be referred to the sociocultural situation or the lack of priests.[206]

Institutions on the national level are: the Association of Religious, founded on 27 August 1966 as a central office for religious institutes; the national seminary San José de la Montaña, with a philosophical and theological faculty under the direction of the Jesuits; the university José Simón Cañas; supradiocesan are, furthermore, the General Secretariat for Parish Schools, the public association Fe y Alegría for the founding of educational institutions; the student-lodging Doble Via, directed by Opus Dei; and so forth.[207] The old associations of the laity, such as Guardia del Santísimo, Hijas de María, Caballeros adoradores, have been replaced by new ones, for example, the Legion of Mary, the Christian Family Movement, and others, in which the priest is no longer the director but an adviser. In all dioceses there exists at least one institution for the education of the laity.[208]

The Land Problem and the Position of the Priests

In mid-1970 forty priests took a stand on the situation in the nation. In this regard they relied on the following data: 89 percent of the arable land is in the hands of 22 percent of owners and export firms. This property includes 50 percent of the coastal area, the richest and with the better commercial ties, while 700,000 hectares lie fallow. The remaining 11 percent of the arable land is held by 78 percent of the owners, who have no sufficient means. The farmers live in a patriarchal system, unable to assume responsibility on their own. They receive starvation wages, live in huts or in unhealthy lodgings, without enough food or access to information and without any contact with civilization. Many emigrate to other countries, conditioned by the concentration of the land in the hands of a few and the rapid growth of the population. In regard to these conditions the priests urge the following views: There is no unconditional legal claim to ownership; the farmer must fight for his own human development, and all personnel necessary for this—teachers, priests, land experts, and the like—must support him; the state must have consideration for him also in its legislation and create the legal presuppositions. The Church must urgently support those exertions which promote this function, as, for example, the Association of Christian Farmers, societies, and so forth. The priests are of the opinion that land reform involves a part of the restructuring of the nation.[209]

---

[205] Annuario Pontificio (1977), 952.

[206] III Anuario eclesiástico de El Salvador (1970), VII–XVI.

[207] Ibid., 33–45.

[208] Ibid., 45–56.

Against the Use of Violence

In view of the tortures, murders, kidnappings, and other acts of violence perpetrated against priests, civilians, and military personnel, the bishops published a letter on 28 February 1971: Recourse to violence can never be Christian, it contradicts the Christian message, which calls for peace and love.[210]

Seminary for Priestly Vocations

On 19 September 1972 the Franciscans dedicated in San Salvador the new seminary Fray Junípero Serra, as a reply to one of the most pressing problems of the episcopate for the promoting of priestly vocations.[211]

The Abortion Law

In a pastoral letter of 1973 the bishops condemned the legalization of abortion, after the criminal code had designated it "as not punishable." The bishops expressly reject abortion if it is performed under circumstances which Christian morality cannot accept.[212]

---

[209] Christus 423, 7f.

[210] SEDOC 4, 251–54.

[211] AICA, 17, 829, 19f.

[212] Ibid. 17, 864, 23f.

GUATEMALA

Guatemala has a total area of 108,889 square kilometers, with about 5 million inhabitants, of whom in 1974 4.347 million were Catholics. The ecclesiastical administration is divided thusly: the archdiocese of Guatemala, with the dioceses of Huehuetenango, Jalapa en Guatemala, Quezaltenango, San Marcos, Santa Cruz del Quiché, Solola, Vera Paz, and Zacapa, the prelacies of Escuintla and Santo Cristo de Esquipulas, and the apostolic administrations of El Petén and Izabal.[213] Ecclesiastical Organizations: National Catholic Secretariat; National Seminary in the capital; Caritas; papal missionary works; the Catholic university Rafael Landívar, conducted by the Jesuits; National Catechetical Center; Centers for the Protection of Youth and Common Pastoral Care. Among the movements of the lay apostolate, the most important are: Catholic Action, Christian Family Movement, National Secretariat for Christian Courses, Marian Congregations, and Apostolate of Prayer.[214]

The religious of Guatemala, organized in the Conferencia de religiosos y religiosas de Guatemala (Confregua), founded the higher institute for religious culture, Regina Coeli, with 24 institutes for brothers and 39 for sisters (statistical handbook for Guatemala of 1971). There are 387 priests, 51 assistants, and 91 brothers active in teaching.

In the republic there are 141 parishes, 96 chapels, 105 high schools, 73 schools, 4 orphanages, 402 centers for the illiterate, 1 school for agricultural social service, 1 institute for Catholic education, 3 radio schools, 602 catechist centers, 5 broadcasting stations. Two hours per week are reserved for Catholic television broadcasting.[215]

Tensions

Three priests and one sister had to leave Guatemala for cooperating with the guerrillas. Two of the priests were blood brothers and belonged to the same congregation: Thomas and Arthur Melville. In a letter of 20 January 1968 Thomas Melville expressed his opinion on his expulsion from the Maryknoll Congregation. In order to prepare to end the poverty and the sad situation of Latin America, in which, in Melville's opinion, the Church authorities are guilty, there is only the route of armed revolution. In agreement with his brother Arthur he said: "We began with this: to make it clear to the Indians that no one, apart from themselves, would defend their rights. If the government and the ruling class use arms in order to keep them, the Indians, in poverty, then they have the right to take up arms in order to defend their God-given right to be men. We and all our adherents were regarded as Communists and asked by our religious superiors and the American embassy to leave the country. We did so. But I say I am just as much a Communist as was Jesus. What I did, I did, and I will do again, following the teaching of Christ and not that of Marx or Lenin. And I say further that we are more than the hierarchy and the United States government think. If the war becomes open, the whole world will experience that we fight neither for Russia nor for China nor for any other nation, but for Guatemala." The superior general of Maryknoll declared: "The activities of Fathers Thomas and Arthur Melville represent a personal interference by American citizens in the internal affairs of a host land. Since they have declined to return to the United States in order to discuss the work accomplished in Guatemala, and because they also refused to comply with the request of their superior in Guatemala, they were suspended from their priestly office."[216]

---

[213] Annuario Pontificio (1977), 953.

[214] Guía de la Iglesia de Guatemala (n.d.), 29–38.

[215] Ibid., 43.

Monseñor Mario Casariego, archbishop of Guatemala, addressed to his faithful at Easter 1968 a pastoral letter with an invitation to penance, prayer, and works of mercy, in an effort to atone for their own and others' many sins. On 16 March he was arrested, presumably because of this letter.[217]

Pastoral Guidelines

In a difficult time for the Church of Guatemala the bishops on 6 January 1970 laid down their pastoral principles in three theses: evangelization and catechesis, human valuation, and apostolate. The Catechetical Department of the National Catholic Secretariat especially should serve for evangelization. For human valuation they demanded that priests, religious, and lay persons concern themselves with the simple population; the bishops are ready to support these exertions, especially in case of persecution by the legal system, assuming that they are in accord with the Gospel. In the apostolate they take a stand for the collaboration of all priests, religious, and lay persons, and remind them that the Church should never mix in political activities. Priests or members of apostolic movements which exploit their position for a political activity are failing their pastoral task and doing great harm to the Church.[218]

The Christian and Political Activity

Starting from the idea that participating in elections is a conscientious duty, the episcopate in a new message of 28 May 1970 reminded the priests and coworkers of the Church that the Church as such should remain far from every partisan political activity, and so in Guatemala it has entered into no obligations whatsoever with political parties and that it had no interest in whether this or that candidate gained the electoral victory.[219] In the name of the ecclesiastical province of Guatemala, the chairman and the secretary of the Episcopal Conference declared on 5 February 1971: "For a homeland that we love more than ourselves and which is in a chaos of unrest and pain, we as Christians reject and condemn every form of violence."[220]

---

[216] SEDOC 4 (Oct. 1968), 585–95.

[217] Ibid., 595–600.

[218] Ibid. 2 (June 1970), 1589–96.

MEXICO

Mexico has a total area of 1.963 million square kilometers and in 1969 had 47.3 million inhabitants, of whom 97 percent were Catholics, but their relations to the Church are mostly limited to baptism or a minimal contact in the course of life.[221] The 2 or 3 million Indians, for the most part baptized, live in a deplorable separation, although in recent years the exertions of religious have somewhat mitigated this situation.[222] The fact that more than 70 percent of the population were peasants or workers gave stimulus to the revolution of 1910. At the same time a Marxist influence was to be discerned through the so-called Casa del Obrero Mundial and the anarchist-Communist indoctrination by Flores Magón; the same is true of the socialist tendencies through the writings of Kropotkin, Proudhon, or Marx. The constitution of 1917 became a reservoir of the people's wishes, which emptied into the "Social Guarantees," whereby the state supported peasants and workers, victims of orthodox liberalism.[223] According to the United Nations statistics of 1976, the number of inhabitants amounted to 58.12 million, of whom 9 percent were Indians, 75 percent mestizos, 10 to 15 percent whites.

In the first decades of the twentieth century Mexico experienced a persecution of the Church. With a few exceptions, the bishops were imprisoned or banished, the priests almost in their entirety were kept in prison in 1914–15, sisters were expelled from the convents, Mass was forbidden, Catholic schools were closed, and almost all church property was confiscated.[224]

---

[219] Ibid. 3 (Feb. 1971), 1015–20.

[220] Ibid. 4 (Aug. 1971), 249–52.

[221] GIMC, 17–22.

[222] Ibid., 23.

[223] V. Vives. op. cit. IV/2, 570–73; "Fe y situación socio-politica de México, Equipo del S.S.M.," Christus 462 (May 1974), 46f.

[224] BMI, 355–61.

Constitution of 1917

The constitution of Querétaro of 5 February 1917 legalized the assault on the Church: nondenominational schools; prohibition of teaching by priests and religious; denial of state recognition of seminary studies; calling into question of celibacy and religious vows; prohibition of religious events outside the church and control by the civil authorities; prohibition of ownership by the Church and its organizations; expropriation of all direct or indirect church property in favor of the state; deprivation of all political and civil rights of priests; prohibition of the Catholic press and of all parties related to the Church.[225]

New Persecution: Plutarco Elías Calles

The persecution continued from 1917 to 1923. Calles (1924–28) demanded the application of the constitution of 1917. The Catholics established the "National League for Defense of Religious Freedom," which acquired publicity for itself and organized legal protests and boycotts. This organized opposition caused the president to issue three new laws. The second, called Ley Calles, forced the episcopate to stop all ecclesiastical events with participation of priests in all churches of the republic after 31 July 1926, the date when the law became effective. Now the struggle was harsher on both sides: the government applied the Ley Calles, the Catholics passed from passive to active armed resistance. During these years, 1926–29, the Mexican Church had its catacombs and martyrs: seventy-eight priests, religious, and lay persons were killed. Nevertheless, with a few exceptions, it remained steadfast in its faith and formed a closed front. All social classes were subject to persecution.[226]

Economic Boycott, the "Cristeros War"

Many Catholic organizations which were cared for and directed by the League planned an economic boycott to force the government to abandon the enforcement of the Ley Calles. Means for this were the total renunciation of all articles of luxury and a restriction in the use of the means of trade. But after all legal measures had been exhausted, the Catholics took up arms "in legitimate defense against an unjust tyranny." The armed movement was everywhere spontaneous and grew in importance from the end of 1926. It was directed by the League and its adherents were called Cristeros because of their war cry, Viva Cristo Rey and because of the crosses which they wore around the neck. The League itself called them "Defenders" and their army the

---

[225] Ibid., 361–71.

[226] Ibid., 373–412.

"National Guard." The movement was popular in more than half the states of the republic and counted about 20,000 armed men. Excesses occurred, but in general the war was waged with idealism, magnanimity, and self-sacrificing devotion. Usually, the fighters were young; they were recruited from students, workers, and peasants. There were great losses; but this war had also a positive aspect, since it shook up the awareness of the Catholic Mexicans and led to a modus vivendi, which must not be evaluated as the outcome of the war but rather as an enforced settlement.[227] The war was hard on both sides. Emilio Portes Gil, president from 1928 to 1930, stated in the press that "there is no conflict which cannot be terminated by mutual goodwill." Representatives of state and Church reached an agreement, which was ratified by Pope Pius XI in 1929 as the lesser evil and to avoid greater harm, namely the prohibition of Mass. There were protests and dissatisfaction on both sides. Many Catholics thought that what was accomplished bore no relationship to the sacrifices made, whereas many adherents of the government and the Freemasons called it a weak yielding by the president. But the agreed compromises were ever less observed by the government. The majority of the Cristeros submitted, but despite the amnesty some were murdered or executed. Others continued the fight or took it up again. The Church, oppressed by the persecution, had to continue to look on helplessly.[228]

Papal Documents

Pius XI attentively followed the events in Mexico and in his Encyclical Acerba animi anxietudo of 29 September 1932 deplored the nonobservance by the Mexican government of the negotiated modus vivendi. He praised the clergy and people of Mexico and asked the Catholics of the nation "to defend the holy rights of the Church" by prayer and the exercise of Catholic Action. The papal document was not well received by the government and the National Party, and the final sentences were interpreted as incitement to rebellion. As a result of this, the apostolic delegate, Leopoldo Ruiz y Flores, was expelled for the third time. The confiscation of Church property was continued by President Lázaro Cárdenas (1934–40), who also ordered that in all schools instruction should be given on the doctrine of socialism, Marxism, and atheism, and in sex education. These measures evoked a wave of protests, and for a time a new version of the bloody Calles regime was feared. But it soon appeared that such unpopular decrees could be carried out only by force; the government had to give in, and there were important changes in the cabinet. However, anticlericalism consistently continued its campaign; it culminated in the closing of the seminaries.

---

[227] Ibid., 412–26.

[228] Ibid., 432f.; D. Olmedo, "Mexico, Modern," New Catholic Encyclopedia IX, 780.

Pius XI continued to follow the development. In a letter of April 1937 to the Mexicans he recommended that they organize peacefully, expand Catholic Action, and maintain the faith. Although the Pope allowed the lawfulness of armed resistance under certain circumstances, the Church as such must never go this way. After almost all seminaries had been closed, Pius XI decided, as a consequence of an offer by the American bishops, to found in the United States a seminary that should be attended by Mexicans who had no opportunity for this in their own country. In September 1937 the Papal National Seminary at Montezuma, New Mexico, was opened; it was operated by the Jesuits and from it came many priests who would later put their stamp on the Church.[229]

Balance Sheet of the Persecution

The Church of Mexico remained unbroken in its faith, but, conditioned by the persecution, it could concentrate neither on the education of youth nor on the spread of the Gospel or of Catholic social doctrine; care of Indians and of farmers and industrial workers retreated into the background. Priests were constantly threatened and had to limit themselves to the most necessary things. Nevertheless, the persecution caused the Mexicans to renew and further develop the old Catholic works and try out other new ones, and brought the knowledge that Christian and evangelical principles must be firmly anchored for a living Church that is in a struggle.[230]

Church and State since 1940

General Manuel Ávila Camacho (1940–46) ended the persecution. Without changing the constitution—only the paragraph on education was rendered harmless—he began an era of fraternization. All official circles were convinced that, in order to accomplish national progress, the Christian faith of the people must be respected. The most important elements of church activity in its pastoral function were Catholic Action, founded in 1928 during the persecution, thousands of catechetical centers, many catechist schools, and a journalism school. In 1920 the Confederación Católica del Trabajo was founded, which counted as many as 85,000 members, the Liga Católica Nacional Campesina of the middle class, and other religious, social, and cultural institutions spread throughout the republic.[231]

---

[229] Cf. BMI, 433–37.
[230] Ibid., 434f., Olmedo, loc. cit., 780.
[231] GIMC, 41–45; Vives, op. cit., 570–72.

Organization of the Mexican Church

In the first quarter of the nineteenth century Mexico, because of the revolution, experienced a sociopolitical and sociocultural change. After 1919 there began a process of industrialization, which was favored by foreign capital investments. Today Mexico is the Latin American country with the highest production capacity. This social change has had an impact also on ecclesiastical institutions in so far as, within these institutions, there is to be recorded a movement which strives for an authentic Mexican structure, less oriented to the colonial model. By 1969 Mexico had eleven archdioceses, forty-seven dioceses, one vicariate apostolic, one prefecture apostolic, and four prelacies nullius; in 1974 there were forty-nine dioceses.[232]

To overcome the difficult problems of common pastoral care, the bishops of Mexico have joined the Unión de Mutua Ayuda Episcopal (UMAE), an unofficial institution, which makes use of socioreligious and socioeconomic investigation to learn the social and religious situation of the individual dioceses and to develop a realistic and effective pastoral plan. The aim is to renew pastoral care on the basis of the knowledge of the Second Vatican Council, to adapt action to change and the development of modern Mexico. This forces the offering of Mexican solutions for the needs of Mexican society.[233] To the UMAE belong twenty-five dioceses with their bishops. To the North Gulf Region belong the dioceses of Matamoros, Ciudad Victoria, Tampico, Ciudad Valles, Tuxpan, and Huajutla; to the Central Gulf Region, the dioceses of Papantla, Jalapa, Veracruz, and San Andrés Tuxtla; other, not precisely defined regions embrace the dioceses of Zacatecas, Tula, Autlán, Zamora, Apatzingań, Tacámbaro, Ciudad Altamirano, Chilapa, Acapulco, Oaxaca, Tehuantepec, Tuxtla Gutiérrez, San Cristóbal, Tapachula, and Campeche. The organization has its headquarters in Mexico City, and to it belong priests and brothers of various dioceses and institutes. The UMAE works according to a proved theoretical-practical plan; general work plan for evaluating the presence of the Church in each region; renewal and planning at meetings of bishops, pastoral commissions, pastoral groups of priests with an organization team, socioreligious investigation in each region.

The goals thus far achieved are: basic courses for pastoral care in many dioceses; pastoral inquiries in many others; special courses for sisters and qualified lay persons; days of recollection and retreats for the clergy. As its means of communication the UMAE has its own quarterly, Servir, which gives current information on pastoral questions.[234]

---

[232] GIMC, 41–45; Vives, op. cit., 570–72.

[233] GIMC, 84.

Parishes and Mission, Organization of the Clergy

In 1968 there were 2,644 parishes for 47,300,000 inhabitants, that is, 17,890 inhabitants per parish. Most recently the parish structure has displayed modifications in view of modern and industrial change. The number of parishes has increased in the dioceses of Mexico City, Morelia, Puebla, and Guadalajara, while it has declined in the ecclesiastical provinces in the south, the north, and on the Gulf of Mexico.[235]

Three mission territories are cared for in Mexico: (1) the northern area of Baja California; there on 13 July 1963 were established the dioceses of Tijuana, with an area of 80,000 square kilometers and 625,000 inhabitants, all of them Catholics, and the diocese of Mexicali, with 620,000 inhabitants in 58,636 square kilometers; (2) the southern area, with the prefecture apostolic of La Paz, with an area of 73,000 square kilometers and 89,000 inhabitants, all of them Catholic, and fourteen parishes with twenty-eight priests; (3) the mission of Tarahumara, established as a vicariate apostolic, with an area of 40,000 square kilometers and 122,000 inhabitants, all Catholic.[236]

In 1968 there worked in the Mexican dioceses 6,348 diocesan priests and 2,103 religious priests, a total of 8,451; hence there were 5,400 inhabitants per priest. The archdioceses with the highest averages are Guadalajara, Morelia, Puebla, and Mexico City.[237] For the training of priests there were in 1966 54 minor seminaries, 5 purely philosophical seminaries, 24 seminaries of philosophy and theology, hence a total of 83, and also the Pio Latino-americano at Rome. Four dioceses still have no minor seminary, 35 no major seminary.[238] Institutes of male religious maintain 402 houses; in the archdiocese of Mexico City alone in 1973 41 orders and lay congregations were active.[239] In 1965 there were 121 congregations of sisters with 1,244 members, who were for the most part occupied in education and nursing.[240] Of course, 90 percent of the schools are public and laicized. The private colleges, most of them run by religious, can impart no religious instruction because of legal regulations. This lack is in part compensated by the work of catechist centers.

---

[234] Ibid., 84–92; A. Castillo, S.J., "Desaparacioń de la UMAE. Tragedia en la Iglesia Mexicana," Christus 436 (1 March 1972), 8f.

[235] GIMC, 57–71.

[236] Ibid., 72f.

[237] Ibid., 92–122.

[238] Ibid., 123–41.

[239] Ibid., 142–70.

[240] Ibid., 171–200.

There are universities in almost all states of the republic; some of them were formerly Catholic, but today all are public and lay; religion is not a course of instruction. The Ibero-American University, founded in Mexico City by Jesuits in 1943, was originally called Centro Cultural Universitario; the academic degrees given there are recognized by the Universidad Nacional Autónoma of Mexico.

Philosophical positivism, which dominated the environment at the universities until 1867, the year of the education law, was at the beginning of the twentieth century supplanted by Bergson's antipositivism. Most recently the influence of Ortega y Gasset (1883–1955), with an existential orientation, has become noticeable. This philosophical movement is strengthened by the presence of Spanish intellectuals.[241]

Episcopal Documents

The internal change within the Mexican Church in recent years finds expression in the pastoral outlook of the bishops. Before the Second Vatican Council they signed fifty-five documents in common, which were concerned predominantly with questions of faith or the economy; the problems of social justice, Catholic Action, and the lay apostolate were only barely touched. In the years of the council, 1962–65, they did not publish even one document, but since 1968 they have been concerned with human, political, social, and religious problems, which are related to the evangelization and salvation of people. These are the most important publications: pastoral letter on the Scout Movement of 9 February 1968;[242] pastoral letter on the development and integration of the nation of 26 March 1968;[243] explanation of Humanae vitae of 9 August 1968;[244] pastoral letter on the student movement of 9 October 1968;[245] information from the episcopate to the Mexican people on school reform of 22 August 1969;[246] pastoral references to the actualization of the lay apostolate in Mexico of 16 January 1970;[247] Episcopal Commission for Social Pastoral Care. Amendments to the document "Justice in Mexico"; Synod of 1971;[248] declaration of the episcopate relative to some educational questions of 15 May 1972;[249] pastoral letter to the Mexican people on responsible fatherhood of 12 December 1972;[250] the Christian responsibility in the face of the social and political option of 18 October 1973;[251] appeal on the occasion of the Olympic Games of 1968.[252]

---

[241] Cf. BMI, 458f.; Vives, op. cit., 572f.; Olmedo, loc. cit., 783.

[242] Christus 386 (Jan.–June 1968), 459–62.

[243] Ibid., 394–430.

[244] Ibid. 398 (Jan. 1969), 8–10.

[245] Ibid., 12–15.

[246] Ibid., 116–77.

[247] Ibid. 410 (Jan.–June 1970), 254–72.

[248] Ibid. 432 (Dec. 1971), 30–45.

Piety of the Mexican

The Mexican experiences his faith mixed with atavisms which tie him to definite cult forms and traditional rites. Especially in the cities these traditions are gradually being lost; in the states they are still maintained, so that the activity of the faith is reduced to a few occasions in the year which have little to do with authentic Catholicism. The sacraments are regarded as an ingredient of social life; thus a person is baptized and married only to save face. Nevertheless, faith in God is deeply moored, and many would sacrifice their life for it; however, there is no substructure, no adequate knowledge of that in which to believe; morality is formalistic. The Mexican is often content with a symbolic piety to the extent that this fulfills certain fundamental needs. However, there are also persons and groups which experience religion more intensively because of their education.[253] Observations and personal contacts with groups of the middle cultural level—high school pupils, students, teachers, study groups of teachers and the professions—indicate the following results: growing estrangement from the Church as an institution; fear of being treated as "underage"; depreciation of their power of judgment and tutelage without regard for their own opinion; no listening to justified criticism by the competent authorities, whereby tensions and dislike arise and a growing alienation from the Church of just those persons who would represent a vital force in it.[254]

National Plan for Common Pastoral Care

In order to deepen and consolidate the faith of the people, there take place in all dioceses numerous study meetings of persons from all classes of society. In this connection a start is made with the ideas "Church" and "World"; from the outset purely sociological or naturalistic as well as theoretical or utopian versions are avoided; instead there is a search for a total overview by means of the faith and of the present reality. The goals set in this are: an effective coresponsibility on all levels of the People of God; abolition of individualism in persons and institutions in order to achieve a unity of criteria, methods of acting, and attitudes for the solution of common problems.[255] By means of the teachings of the Second Vatican Council and of the Congress of Medellín of 1968, the Mexican bishops have taken a clear positon toward the question of the development and integration of the nation and on the Christian obligation toward social necessities. In this connection must be seen the closing in 1971 of the Jesuit institute Patria. The basic notion is that an adaptation to the present social injustice and cooperation in a structure that favors social alienation is not in accord with Christ and the Gospel.[256]

---

[249] Ibid. 440 (July 1972), 41–52.

[250] Ibid. 447 (Feb. 1973), 46–51.

[251] Ibid. 459 (Feb. 1974), 48–62.

[252] Ibid. 386 (Jan.–June 1968), 586–608; cf. Christus 423 (Feb. 1971), 32.

[253] Cf. "Perfil religioso del mexicano actual," Christus 426 (May 1971), 24; ibid., 30–34.

[254] Cf. E. Cid, "Reflexiones sobre la situación religiosa," Christus 398 (Jan.–June 1969), 572–74.

The faith, understood in its vital reality, includes metanoia, the complete changing of a person, which should be expressed in his social behavior. From this consideration the episcopate took a stand on the problem of development and integration, for example in its letter of 26 March 1968: "We cannot overlook what differences exist between the regional development of our country and the sectors of economic life . . . we cannot hide that we arrive at a point where the citizens seek and must accept profound changes, if one does not want to watch passively how the power of the strong and the servitude of the weak constantly grow; thus the state of injustice is sharpened, which cries to heaven because of the violence which is done to human dignity."[257] The obstacles to progress are also named, and which efforts are necessary for an integral development.[258]

The reactions are numerous. Many bishops, the majority of priests and religious, lay organizations, and the faithful have felt this program as correct, if the doctrine of the Gospel is applied in an apostolic and priestly spirit, like the Samaritan, who, without hesitation and full of love, took the poor and suffering man and assigned effective aid to him.[259] The Institution Rougier, founded on 3 October 1966, gives assistance by the prayer, sacrifice, and good works of diocesan and religious priests, whose sphere of activity is always described, without mentioning names.[260] The Legion of Mary, founded in 1921, places its members in the service of evangelization. The "Pilgrimage for Christ," a method preferred by the legion, extends to two or three weeks; the legionaries sacrifice their annual vacation and pay out of their own pocket part of the expenses for lodging and board at those places where they exercise their mission activity.[261] At its national meeting in Mexico City in February 1974 Catholic Action adopted as its program of action for the period 1974–77 service to the Church and to all people. In the concrete it was a question of the following tasks: training of committed coworkers; evangelization of persons; promotion of exchanges of human experiences; development of criteria which make possible a better organization between national and regional plans of action. The intellectual and action-oriented basic theses for the next national plan form the continuation of the guidelines issued in the sixteenth national assembly: education, evangelization, and encouragement of people.[262]

---

[255] Cf. Christus 40 (July–Dec. 1970), 546–56.

[256] E. Maza, "Los jesuítas cierran el instituto Patria," Christus 424 (March 1971), 7f.

[257] Christus 386 (Jan.–June 1968), 398.

[258] Cf. ibid., 18–28, 404–10.

[259] Cf. ibid., 462 (May 1974), 49f.

[260] Ibid. 386 (Jan.–June 1968), 726f.

"Priests for the Poor"

The group appearing in public in April 1972 aimed to strengthen the presence of the Church as helper of people, especially of the poor and oppressed, in the fight for the building of a new society. The Church should "be the community of people who are committed to the changing of society, for this sign of change is the sign of the Spirit of God and leads people and nations to their calling."[263] On the occasion of their first congress, 21–23 November 1972, they published a document in which they rejected alternatives such as state capitalism. mixed economy, or social Christianity, and expressed themselves for a "socialist project," which should produce a radical alteration of the economic structures through the socialization of the means of production and their administration by collectives. The "socialist project" offers the only possibility of freeing oneself from the imperialistic structure of international capitalism. However, this plan cannot be implemented so long as it is not supported by the people. The "Priests for the Poor" choose this socialist expedient "in the name of the most elementary rights . . . as human beings, Christians, priests, who have the desire to follow the Church loyally." They are convinced that the function of the Church in Mexico and Latin America does not consist in organizing new versions of the Inquisition or in blocking the rise of the new persons, but, on the contrary, in working for the liberty of the children of God."[264]

---

[261] J. M. Ganuza, S.J., "La legión de María obra del espíritu," Christus 410 (Jan.–June 1970), 582–602.

[262] AICA 18, 893 (31 Jan. 1974), 23f.

[263] A. Castillo, S.J., "Un paso adelante.Sacerdotes para el pueblo," Christus 439 (June 1972), 7f.

[264] "Documento del primer congreso del movimiento 'Sacerdotes para el pueblo,'" Christus 447 (Feb. 1973), 54–57.

CHAPTER 25

The Young Churches in Asia, Africa, and Oceania *

Even only an approximately complete presentation of the development of the young Churches from the middle of the twentieth century to the present would require several volumes. The available source material in the missions archives of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, formerly the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, at Rome, in the archives of missionary orders and societies, and not least in those of the young Churches themselves is simply inexhaustible. Here we must restrict ourselves to the most striking events, but select those which appear to us as the characteristic criteria of the most recent missionary era: end of the colonial epoch, indigenization of the mission Churches, transfer of direction of the missions to native hands, erection of regular ecclesiastical hierarchies, new attitude of Rome to the question of native rites, establishment of apostolic delegations and nunciatures, new estimation of cultures and of the great world religions, new missionary spirituality and missionary awareness in the so-called Christian countries. However, in addition to these topics, many other important mission questions appear, which, on account of their actual importance and because they belong essentially to a complete mission history, need a detailed presentation, such as development aid, cultural and social work, translation of Scripture into the vernaculars, linguistic research, apostolate of the press, fostering of native art and music, the inner ecclesiastical life of the communities, and so forth. We ask indulgence for the topics not adequately discussed here because of the restricted space at our disposal and the remaining lacunae. Finally we ask you to bear in mind that the absence of historical distance from the most recent happenings demands brevity and imposes caution in judgment.[1]

The guidelines for the development of the young Churches were determined by the Popes in their mission encyclicals,[2] by the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples in its most recent instructions,[3] and by the episcopal conferences of the young Churches. There can be no doubt that it was precisely the missionary dicastery of the Curia, which was often disdainfully evaluated as a purely administrative office, that in the last fifty years took praiseworthy initiatives and paved the way for the development of the young Churches. That is why the Second Vatican Council, at which at first a few of the council fathers had advocated the abolition of this congregation, because they erroneously regarded it as a colonial institution—the contrary is the case: it was from the start an anticolonial institution[4]—expressly reconfirmed this congregation for a suitable and necessary aggiornamento and extended its competence.[5]

---

* Joseph Metzler

[1] The origin of the young Churches in the period 1922–72 was presented in more detail by us in Volume III/2 of Sacre Congregationis de Propaganda Fide Memoria Rerum (Freiburg 1976), 464–577. Supplements to this in the other contributions of this volume. For this history of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith Pope Paul VI gave the collaborators the express permission to use and evaluate the archival sources of the congregation's archives, not yet released for research (cf. Memoria Rerum III/1, XX–XXI). The present contribution also profited from this permission.

[2] Cf. the biblio. for this chapter, especially T. Scalzotto, I Papi e la Sacra Congregazione . . . The pertinent passages of the mission encyclicals down to Paul VI also in A.

Reuter, Summa Pontificia Vol. II. Other important papal and conciliar mission documents in Appendix III of Vol. III/2 of Memoria Rerum.

[3] Published in the "Supplementum" of the Bibliografia Missionaria. In addition, all important documents of a general nature of the mission dicastery since 1961 are here, and also the decrees published in the course of each year. All instructions and pertinent documents are also in the above-mentioned Appendix III of Memoria Rerum.

[4] Cf. our article in the Rheinischer Merkur of 26 November 1976.

[5] One of the most important directives was that for the future "selected representatives of all of those who cooperate in the missionary work have an active role with a decisive vote: bishops from the entire world after hearing the episcopal conferences, as well as directors of the institutes and of the papal mission works" (mission decree of the Second Vatican Council, Ad Gentes, no. 29). In the subsequent papal documents, Ecclesiae Sanctae of 6 August 1966 (AAS 58 [1966], 757–87), Pro comperto sane of 6 August 1967 (AAS 59 [1967], 881–84), and Regimini Ecclesiae Universae of 15 August 1967 (ibid., 885–928), the number of these membra adiuncta was fixed at twenty-four—sixteen bishops, twelve of whom had to be missionary bishops, four superiors general of missionary institutes, four national directors of the papal mission works—to which was then added the secretary of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, and a seat and vote were given in the "coetibus plenariis" of the Congregation to those "tamquam Membra in quibus res maioris momenti et naturam principii generalis habentes sint pertractandae" (Pro comperto sane). Some, who have regarded the "Council of the Twenty-Four"—which never existed as such, and besides there were twenty-five!—as a sort of covering organization of the Roman mission authority, designated these postconciliar measures as a "watering down" of the conciliar decree (cf. Le missioni cattoliche 97 [Milan 1968], 65f.; Herder-Korrespondenz 22 [Freiburg 1968], 168f.). In reality hereby the position of the membra adiuncta should be reevaluated, and the same right and voice be given to them in the plenary sessions, in which the most important decisions in mission affairs are taken, as to the cardinals and the other members of the congregation. This clarification is not unimportant for the understanding of the following exposition.

The Young Churches in Asia

THE FAR EAST

China

The mission Church in China gave promise of the fairest hopes after the establishment of the apostolic delegation in 1922, the elimination of tensions between foreign and Chinese clergy, the transfer of the direction of the ecclesiastical territories to the Chinese clergy, the elimination of the French protectorate, and the happy overcoming of the painful struggle over rites.[6] The Chinese National Synod of Shanghai in 1924 stood at the beginning of the new development. It became, so to speak, the foundation of the young Church in China. But the construction was impeded and finally completely destroyed by political events.

The Chinese-Japanese conflict of 1937–41 frightfully injured the mission. By December 1941 one bishop, one prefect apostolic, fifty-five priests, seventeen brothers, and nine sisters were murdered. They fell victim to the Communists, the partisans, and an unbridled soldiery. But the number of the faithful still increased in those years and in 1941 reached 3,128,157. The outbreak of the Japanese-American war on 7 December 1941 produced a new turn. The foreign missionaries were to a great extent interned. Three-fifths of the missionaries who were active in China in 1940 came from abroad. Eighty-five percent of these belonged to one of the two warring sides. The chief burden of the mission Church was transferred to the shoulders of the Chinese clergy.

Despite the confusions of the war and other inconveniences connected with it and injuries to the Church, Rome began to prepare the setting-up of the regular ecclesiastical hierarchy in China. At the beginning of 1942 there were in China eighty-eight vicariates apostolic and thirty-nine prefectures apostolic. The latter were gradually to be raised to vicariates and preferably transferred to the Chinese clergy. In 1946 there were already twenty-eight Chinese ordinaries, of whom twenty-one were bishops. Five thousand five priests—of whom 2,008 were Chinese—1,262 brothers, and 6,138 sisters took part in the missionary work. There were 1,037 seminarians, 3,524 students in minor seminaries, and 1,590 pupils in preparatory schools. The missionary personnel also included 6,748 male and 4,659 female catechists, and 7,799 male and 5,604 female teachers. In the first postwar consistory of 18 February 1946 Pius XII admitted the vicar apostolic of [6] Cf. on this especially Memoria Rerum, 472–76.

---

Tsingtao, Thomas Tien Ken-sin, S.V.D., to the College of Cardinals.[7] He was the first Chinese cardinal. At the Pope's suggestion on this occasion he wrote a memorandum on the situation and problems of the Church in China. He thereby gave the final impulse to the erection of the hierarchy. The formal decision on this matter was made by the cardinals of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in their sitting of 8 April 1946,[8] and Pius XII gave his approval in an audience on 11 April.[9] Twenty ecclesiastical provinces were erected, the vicariates and prefectures were raised to dioceses, twenty of them to archdioceses, and the ordinaries were made bishops or archbishops respectively. A month later Cardinal Tien was transferred to the archiepiscopal see of Peking,[10] which had been vacated before the erecting of the hierarchy by the resignation submitted by Bishop Paul-Léon-Cornélie Montaigne, C.M. It was fitting that the first Chinese cardinal have his seat in the nation's capital. Of course, the transfer of the archdiocese of Peking from the French Vincentians to the Chinese clergy was connected with it. Rome made provision that no objections should arise from the side of France, neither political, liturgical,[11] nor economic.

Two other events of 1946 were of great significance for the Chinese mission Church: the establishment of the internunciature on 6 July, that is, the admittance of direct diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the government at Peking,[12] and the beatification of twenty-nine Chinese martyrs of 1900.[13] The first internuncio was the titular bishop Antonio Riberi.

The statistics of the Chinese mission Church of 1948 yield the following picture: 3,276,282 faithful, 3,015 foreign and 2,676 Chinese priests, 632 Chinese and 475 foreign brothers, 5,112 Chinese and 2,351 foreign sisters, 216 hospitals, 254 orphanages, and 4,446 schools of various grades.

In the succeeding years Rome continued in an increasing measure to entrust the ecclesiastical jurisdictions to Chinese ordinaries. But the Communist occupation of the country and the only too well known political events attending it made all further Roman decisions in favor of the Chinese mission Church illusory. The connection with the outside world was more and more broken. Only in roundabout ways did the frightful news of the incipient persecution of the Church reach the rest of the world. With the governmental decree of 23 June 1950 on the suppression of "counterrevolutionary activity" began the systematic struggle against the Church. The foreign missionaries were expelled, often after ignominious show trials, mistreatment, and imprisonment. The internuncio was tactlessly banished.

---

[7] AAS 38 (1946), 104.

[8] Archives of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (=AP): Acta Sacrae Congregationis 317 (1946), f. 131^r–142^r.

[9] AAS 38 (1946), 301–13.

[10] Session of 6 May, audience of 10 May: AP, Acta 317 (1946), f. 174^r–188^r, AAS 38 (1946), 238, 360.

[11] The diplomatic representative of France in Peking enjoyed certain privileges in the church of the Vincentians.

[12] AAS 38 (1946), 313f.

[13] Ibid. 39 (1947), 307–11 (the Pope's homily).

In the apostolic letter of 18 January 1952 to the ordinaries in China Pius XII expressed his pain at the persecution of Christians and tried to comfort the faithful. He spoke of his love for the Chinese people, of his admiration of its historical and cultural past, of the task and the wish of the Church to encourage whatever is good, true, and beautiful among all peoples. He encouraged the Chinese Catholics. The Church, he said, can be fought but never defeated.[14] In the encyclical Ad Sinarum gentem of 7 October 1954 he condemned the persecution of Christians even more severely.[15] But these writings, like the news of the beatification of another fifty-six Chinese martyrs in 1955,[16] may not have become known in China. However, in 1958 about thirty Chinese bishops, loyal to Rome, and many priests and faithful were in prison because of their faith.

In these years the Communist regime changed its persecuting tactics and tried to construct a National Chinese Church separated from Rome. From December 1957 to January 1962 a total of forty-five Chinese bishops appointed by the state were ordained without papal approval. In the letter Ad Apostolorum Principes of 29 June 1958 Pius XII condemned these uncanonical episcopal ordinations,[17] and John XXIII in his address in the consistory of 15 December 1958 even used the word "schism" for them.[18] Also in his letter to the episcopate on Taiwan of 29 June 1961 Pope John again referred to the situation of the Church in Mainland China.[19] Pope Paul VI even tried to talk with Communist China. In an address of 20 October 1963 he said how gladly he would have embraced all Chinese bishops on the occasion of the Second Vatican Council.[20] On 31 December 1965, three months after the Pope had come out in his speech before the United Nations in New York for the admission of states which were not yet members of the world organization, hence China also, he sent a personal telegram to Mao Tse-tung. The occasion was the request to promote peace in Vietnam. He ended with the words: "Nous vous prions d'accueillir cet appel ainsi que les voeux fervents que Nous formons devant Dieu pour le peuple chinois au seuil de l'anneé nouvelle."[21] However, the raising of the internunciature on Taiwan to the nunciature on 24 December 1966 was interpreted by some observers as an unfriendly act in regard to Communist China. The Pope corrected this impression in his memorable talk on 6 January 1967, when, on the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of the establishment of the hierarchy in China, he celebrated a Solemn Mass in Saint Peter's for the Catholics of China. On this occasion he said quite openly that it was his desire to have contacts with Communist China and to enter into friendly relations with it.[22] (On 31 January 1973 the pronuncio on Taiwan, Edward Cassidy, was made pronuncio in Bangladesh, and the nunciature on Taiwan was thereafter directed by a chargé d'affaires.) In the next few years the Cultural Revolution in China made all further efforts at contact useless. In the course of this revolution there occurred a new, very severe persecution of Christians, directed not only against the last foreign sisters in the Peking diplomats' school of the Sacred Heart, but especially against the faithful themselves. Church buildings were plundered, partly burned, or secularized.

---

[14] Ibid. 44 (1952), 153–58.

[15] Ibid. 47 (1955), 5–14.

[16] Ibid. 381–88.

[17] Ibid. 50 (1958), 601–14.

[18] Ibid. 985.

[19] Ibid. 53 (1961), 465–69.

[20] Speech on the afternoon of Mission Sunday in the Collegio Urbano: "How happy We would be, with the bishops who are taking part in the council, to embrace also all

In May 1970 Catholic bishops of the United States advised their government to leave nothing untried to arrange talks with Communist China. Perhaps the release three months later of the American Bishop James Edward Walsh from the Chinese prison he had been in since 1960 may be regarded as Mao Tse-tung's reply. In Rome, too, fresh hope was gathered.

By the end of 1971 reports were reaching Europe from China, of course very contradictory ones. Chinese Catholics living in the West had been able, by various channels, to make connections with their homeland, journalists and athletes received permission to visit China. From the meager news people thought it could be inferred that there were still in China ca. 1,000 functioning Catholic priests and sixty-five bishops, though of the latter forty-five had been appointed by the government without consulting the Holy See, and that the Church was bishops of this immensely wide area [China]" (Herder-Korrespondenz 18 [1963–64], 112).

---

[21] AAS 58 (1966), 164.

[22] Ibid. 59 (1967), 68–71.

still alive in China, even though the number of faithful seemed to have dropped sharply. The persecutions were unable to suppress the Christian faith. Quite the contrary: under the external pressure the intensity of the faith increased. So said Father Ladany, S.J., in Hong Kong, one of the best informed persons on events in Red China. The assertion that there were no more Christians in China, he wrote, is false.[23] Since November 1971 Mass could be celebrated in one church, Nantang, in Peking. However, the faithful are mostly, even if not exclusively, members of foreign embassies.[24]

Taiwan

The events in Mainland China, which had as a consequence the departure of many priests and faithful for the island of Taiwan, pushed this long overlooked and unproductive mission area into the foreground since the 1950s. In 1949 Rome erected the prefectures apostolic of Taipei (for the Chinese congregation of priests of the Discipuli Domini) and Kaoshung (for the Dominicans), in 1950 the prefecture of Taichung (for the Maryknoll Missionaries), and in 1952 the prefectures of Chiayi and Hwalien (for Chinese diocesan priests and those of the Paris Mission Seminary respectively). At the same time Taipei was raised to an archdiocese and given to the Disciputi Domini. From then on evangelization made greater progress. Even the evangelization of the original inhabitants, who were estimated at 150,000 with twenty different languages, could be taken up. After overcoming the initial difficulties, a real conversion movement began among them, which became the most striking characteristic of the Taiwan mission of the 1950s. But the mission was able also to record successes among the Chinese refugees from the mainland. The student youths especially showed sympathy for the Catholic Church. Chinese diocesan priests, Jesuits, and Benedictine nuns taught at both state universities. Less numerous were the conversions among the Buddhist Taiwanese. In the decade of 1949–59 the total number of Catholics rose from 12,326 to 163,814 and today is approximately 290,000. In 1961 a part of the archdiocese of Taipei was erected as the diocese of Shinchiku. In addition to the missionaries already mentioned, there were Jesuits, Vincentians, Scheut Fathers (Congregation of the Immaculate Heart of Mary), Camillians, Franciscans, and members of the S.A.M. Mission Helpers, and many congregations of sisters. The Catholic University of Taipei, founded in 1963 by Archbishop Yü Pin at the urging of Pope John XXIII, was regarded as the successor of the Peking Fu-jen

---

[23] Die katholischen Missionen (Freiburg 1971), 15.

[24] Ibid. (Freiburg 1972), 148–52; (1973), 153–56; (1978), 39f.

University, and was intended to continue the Catholic university system flourishing on the mainland before the persecution. It began with 400 students and in 1973 had around 9,000 students and 554 professors, five faculties recognized by the state—philosophy, natural science, economics, law, foreign languages—and a theological faculty not recognized by the state. Since 1969 the last mentioned has published the theological quarterly Shen Hsiao Lün Chi (Collectanea Theologica). It aims to teach "Chinese" theology. That the Church embody itself organically in Chinese culture and remove the appearance of its foreign character is also the aim of the hierarchy.

Japan

In Japan since 1932 necessity ever more emphatically urged putting the direction of the young Church in Japanese hands. The first Japanese bishop, Januarius Hayasaka of Nagasaki, was appointed in 1927 and on 30 October he was ordained at Rome by Pius XI.[25] The situation long remained confined to this first measure of Japanization, whereas the Protestant mission advanced much faster on this route and had already relinquished almost all the ecclesiastical jurisdictions to Japanese. The complaint was heard that the Catholic Church still depended entirely on foreigners. This all the more, when the new intellectual outlook of the Japanese was marked by a mistrust of the Western world and by the conviction of the superiority of their own culture. This was not without consequences for the missionary situation of the Catholic Church. Finally from 1936 Rome made greater progress toward the Japanization of the Church. In fact, from now on events pushed on one another. The settlement of the controversy over the Japanese rites, that is, the permission for the faithful to take part in the purely civil customs of social life, "which nowadays are generally regarded as mere marks of courtesy and of mutual good will, even if they originally had a superstitious character," was the most important step in this direction.[26] When on 25 May 1936 Pius XI approved the relevant instruction of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, he said that the faithful had not only the permission to share in these patriotic and civil ceremonies but the duty.

---

[25] AAS 19 (1927), 379f. (The Pope's homily). As early as the beginning of 1933 the bishop was forced to resign for reasons of health and other causes. In 1937 Paulus Aijiro Yamaguchi became his successor.

[26] Instruction of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith of 26 May 1936 in AAS 28 (1936), 406–09; Sylloge praecipuorum documentorum recentium Summorum Pontificum et S. Congregationis de Progaganda Fide . . . (Vatican City 1939), 537–40, N. 201; Collectanea Commissionis Synodalis 9 (Peking 1936), 872–74; Memoria Rerum III/2, 483–87.

This new attitude of Rome in regard to Japanese morals and customs could not prevent the Catholic Church and, in general, all Christianity from being drawn, in the next years, into the powerfully flourishing antiforeign Japanese nationalistic movement. The slogan put it: Christianity is a foreign religion, hence not for the Japanese. The attitude was further accentuated with the forcible takeover by Fumimaro Konoye in July 1940 and the higher valuation of the worship of the Emperor. The antiforeign animosity had as a consequence even sharper attacks on the Catholic Church as this was still to a great extent governed by foreign prelates. Only in Tokyo and Nagasaki was there a Japanese bishop and in Kagoshima a Japanese prefect apostolic. The "Law on Religious Corporations" of 25 March 1939 left no doubt that the government was seeking complete control of ecclesial communities and no longer recognized foreigners as representatives of the communities. Rome now hastened to turn over all ecclesiastical territories to Japanese prelates. The foreign bishops voluntarily resigned. Now the Japanese ordinaries could take steps toward legal recognition of the Catholic church communities by the state, in accord with the law on corporations. They worked out the "constitutions" of the Japanese Church and thereby acquired state recognition in May 1941. A little later the Protestant Churches followed this step. In this way the mission Church in Japan was spared immensely injurious consequences. Rome, of course, subjected these constitutions to strong criticism. One of the cardinals who had to pronounce judgment on them compared them to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy in the French Revolution. The apostolic delegate since 1933, Paolo Marella, who had shared substantially in the drafting of the constitution, was accused of having acted without consultation with Rome. Cardinal Pietro Fumasoni-Biondi, prefect of the congregation for the Propagation of the Faith from 1933 to 1960, saved the situation and hence the constitution of the young Church in Japan by making it clear that Rome had not at all been asked for approval of the constitution. On this occasion he expressed his joy that the Japanese mission Church had made such good progress in recent times and thanked the foreign missionaries for having voluntarily relinquished their position to the Japanese clergy. He expressed the hope that this example might be imitated in other mission lands also.[27]

A completely new missionary situation occurred in Japan after World

---

[27] This Italian prefect of the Roman missionary authority had already shown his sound sense of the present-day questions. Thus he had given the "green light" for the reopening and solving of the question of the Chinese Rites, to discuss this question contrary to the earlier directive of the Holy Office. For the details of the life and evaluation of the prefectship of Fumasoni-Biondi, cf. Memoria Rerum III/2, 313–15.

War II. The Shinto state worship was abolished. On New Year's Day 1946 Emperor Hirohito declared that the previous religious doctrines of the state were myths. Shintoism became a purely private religion. The antiforeign outlook of the Japanese seemed to become quite the opposite in the first postwar years. The prospects for the missions increased. At Yokohama, for example, the number of catechumens tripled at one stroke. Sisters were able to set up a higher school for girls at the Buddhist center of Nagano. The port city of Yokosuka, a military port, hitherto inaccessible to foreigners, very quickly became a flourishing center of Catholic missionary activity. The Protestant American supreme commander offered the Catholics several buildings for the erection of schools and of a hospital. Rome multiplied the missionary personnel. In 1958 there were in Japan 1,220 foreign and 359 Japanese priests, 166 foreign and 250 native brothers, 1,063 foreign and 3,050 Japanese sisters. In the two seminaries at Tokyo and Fukuoka there were 260 seminarians. In 1975 there were in Japan twelve native Japanese congregations of sisters of diocesan right and one secular institute.[28]

However, it must be stated soberly that, after years of hope-filled creativity, the results of the mission, in regard to numbers, do not correspond to the exertions of the missionaries. In 1958 there were only 266,000 Catholics in the population of 92 million, and ten years later only 345,000, whereas the total population had increased to 100 million. In 1974 there were 363,000 Catholics among 109.5 million inhabitants, and in 1977 392,000 faithful among 113 million. Happier is the increase of native vocations. Of the 1,966 priests, 869 are Japanese. The number of Japanese sisters amounts to 6,052. About 800 foreign sisters help them. And today the number of Japanese brothers is greater than that of the foreign.

However, this is not the only aspect to be considered in evaluating the young Church in Japan. The moral reputation of the Catholic Church and its influence on the public must not be underestimated. The Church "shows itself Japanese, speaks Japanese, shares according to its means in Japanese life. Hence, on the whole the Church presents a Japanese image, thanks especially to its native leadership."[29] It has become more attractive to the Japanese. The Second Vatican Council contributed substantially to this. The religious institutions cultivate a dialogue with the non-Christian religions in Japan and exert themselves for a close collaboration with them in the service of humanity.

---

[28] "Supplementum" of the Bibliografia Missionaria, Anno XXXIX–1975, Quaderno no. 18 (Rome 1976), 27–30.

[29] H. Dumoulin, S.J., Die Bedeutung des Christentums in Japan: Die katholischen Missionen (1977), 118–122, here 118.

Korea

In the young Church in Korea the ordinaries had been preparing the Korean clergy since 1927, by a mandate from Rome, to assume the direction of the mission. But the political situation made the transfer difficult. The Koreanization of the Church encountered the opposition of the Japanese occupying power, which wanted to see Japanese ordinaries in charge of the ecclesiastical jurisdictions. Nevertheless, in 1942, after the resignation of the vicar apostolic of Seoul (Keijo in Japanese), Rome appointed the Korean priest Paul Ro (his Korean name) Okamoto (his Japanese name) as his successor, first as administrator and then on 10 November of the same year as vicar apostolic with episcopal ordination. But in the case of Taiku, whose ordinary had likewise resigned, the Roman mission officials had to yield to the occupying power. They appointed the Japanese priest Irenaeus Kyubei Hayasaka as administrator. On 10 November 1942 they promoted him also to bishop, without, however, naming him as vicar apostolic.

With the growing tensions between Japan and the United States, the situation of the American missionaries in Japan and the conquered territories became ever more critical. Until 1941 the vicar apostolic of Heijo, the name from 1939 for Hpyeng Yang, William O'Shea, M.M., and his Maryknoll Missionaries were able to act freely. But in December of that year all except him and his secretary were interned. In June 1942 all American missionaries returned to the United States within the framework of an exchange of internees. Earlier O'Shea had given the necessary spiritual faculties to the Korean priest Francis Hong (his Korean name) Takeoka (his Japanese name). Confirmed by Rome on 18 February 1943, he understood superlatively how to guide the destinies of the mission through the unpropitious times. He even maintained good contacts with the Japanese authorities. After the end of Japanese domination of Korea Rome had a free hand in the filling of the ecclesiastical posts with Korean ordinaries. On 7 June 1947 Pius XII appointed Patrick James Byrne, M.M., as apostolic visitor of the missions in Korea, with the faculties of an apostolic delegate.[30] A little later, on 7 April 1949, an apostolic delegation was established in Korea, with Byrne as the first occupant.[31]

Severe external trials were in store for the Korean mission Church. Here the political events may be assumed as familiar. Because of the Communist occupation of North Korea, 57,000 Catholics were virtually cut off from the rest of the Church. Abbot-Bishop Boniface Sauer, O.S.B., of the abbey nullius of Tŏgwŏn that had been erected in 1940, died as a victim of the new rulers as a consequence of mistreatment in a concentration camp. The vicar apostolic of P'yŏngyang, Bishop Francis Hong, was missing. Many missionaries were killed or deported, including Apostolic Delegate Byrne, who died in a prison camp on 26 November 1960.

---

[30] AAS 39 (1947), 463.

[31] Ibid. 42 (1950), 327.

In South Korea, on the other hand, the number of the faithful quickly grew to over 215,000 and in 1956 reached 241,830, among whom were to be counted 27,332 catechumens. Still, vis-à-vis the 20 million inhabitants, the Catholics constituted only a small minority.

In the succeeding years there came to the foreground the plan of erecting the ecclesiastical hierarchy, which took place on 10 March 1962.[32] Three ecclesiastical provinces were established: Seoul, with the suffragan sees of P'yŏngyang, Hamhŭng, Chunchŏn, Taejŏn, and Inchon; Taegu, with the suffragan sees of Chŏngju and Pusan; and Kwangju, with that of Jeonju. In addition, the abbey nullius of Tŏgwŏn continued, directly subject to the Holy See. There were around this time in South Korea more than 488,000 Catholics, 282 Korean priests (with 236 foreign priests), and 1,039 Korean sisters (out of a total of 1,170). Foreign communities active in Korea included: the Paris Mission Seminary, the Missionary Benedictines of Sankt Ottilien, Franciscans, Conventuals, Jesuits, the Hospitallers of Saint John of God, the Missionaries of Saint Francis de Sales of Annecy, Marianists, Salesians, Maryknoll Missioners, and the Columban Missionaries of Ireland; also, the Korean Samists and the Brothers of the Holy Korean Martyrs. There were five communities of Korean Sisters.[33] Of the foreign sisters, those of Saint Paul of Chartres had the most numerous representation. They counted 295 Korean sisters in their ranks.[34]

On 11 December 1963 Paul VI erected the internunciature of Korea,[35] which was changed to a nunciature on 5 September 1966.[36] Two further important events for the Korean mission Church of the most recent past were the beatification of twenty-four Korean martyrs of 1866 on 6 October 1968 and the creation of the first Korean cardinal, Stephen Sou Hwan Kim, in the consistory of 28 April 1969.

In the 1970s the Christian churches in South Korea, even though they included numerically only a small part of the population, became the center of the intellectual opposition to the dictatorship of the Park regime. The tensions between Church and state led in August 1974 to the imprisoning of Bishop Tji Hak Soun of Wonju, who was condemned as an "agitator" by a military court to fifteen years in prison. In February 1975 he, with 150 other political prisoners, was released.

---

[32] Ibid. 54 (1962), 552–55.

[33] Today there are in Korea six native congregations of sisters of diocesan right: "Supplementum" of the Bibliografia Missionaria, Anno XXXIX–1975, Quaderno no. 18 (Rome 1976), 22f.

[34] Cf. J. Chang-mun Kim and J. Jae-sun Chung, Catholic Korea Yesterday and Today (Seoul 1964).

[35] AAS 56 (1964), 235.

[36] Ibid. 58 (1966), 875.

Today the young Church of Korea counts about 990,000 faithful in a total population of 40.5 million, not counting P'yŏngyang and Tokwon, for which, according to the 1978 Annuario Pontificio, no statistics are available.

SOUTHEAST ASIA

India

In the mission Church of India important happenings in the two decades before World War II helped to prepare the future. There was, first, the progressive transfer of the ecclesiastical direction into native hands, which of course proceeded much too slowly for the Indian clergy. Opposition and obstacles arose chiefly from the Indian caste system which frustrated some Roman plans. The abolition of the oath concerning rites freed the route on a broader level for the better Indianization of the young Church. After the publication of the instruction of 8 December 1939 on the Chinese rites there appeared the question of whether the missionaries in India had to continue to take the so-called oath on rites which in 1739 Clement XII had prescribed for all missionaries in the kingdoms of Madura, Mysore, and Carnatic. Right from the start obscurities had existed as to the extent of this obligation, which could not be cleared up in the succeeding period.[37] In the course of time Rome had replied to the doubts that cropped up with the stereotyped but by no means clarifying formula "nihil esse innovandum."[38] Considering this and the decision issued a few months earlier in regard to the Chinese rites, the cardinals of the Roman Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith decided in their session of 8 April 1940 that the obligation to the oath "sopra i riti malabarici" was to be abolished; the Pope confirmed this in audience the next day.[39]

---

[37] Cf. especially the letters of 13 October 1744 and 6 February 1745 of the Roman mission dicastery in AP, Lettere 161f., 146^r–148^r, 171^r–174^v; also, Collectanea S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide I (Rome 1907), nos. 594 and 607.

[38] Cf. AP, Lettere 331f., 532^v (letter to the superior of the Paris Mission Seminary of 20 July 1844); 351f., 296^v–297^v (letter of 18 May 1860 to the vicar apostolic of Jaffna); Registro delle Risoluzioni del S. Offizio 2 (1853), 34, no. 2; 6 (1873), 5; Collectanea S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide I (Rome 1907), no. 993; Lettere 362f., 1058^r–1059^r (letter of 27 October 1969 in regard to an inquiry of the vicar apostolic of Colombo).

A second happening was the conversion of two bishops of the Syro-Malankarese, Mar Ivanios (Givergis Thomas) Panikervirtis and Mar Theophilus (Jacob Abraham) Kalapurakal, to the Catholic Church in 1930. This was a first success of the strivings for union between the Syrian Orthodox and the Catholic Church. The movement for union stopped. On 28 August 1977 Archbishop Mar Felixnose of the Independent Syrian Orthodox Malabarese Church, together with his secretary, completed his union with Rome.

Finally, still a fourth, not unessential chapter on the way of the Indian Church into the future must be mentioned. Portugal gradually renounced its missionary patronate in India and thereby ended a century-long tug-of-war with the missionary authorities in Rome. On the occasion of filling the Church offices with Indian ordinaries, there was no consultation with Portugal. No protest came from Lisbon on the division of those dioceses for which the agreement of 1928 had granted to the patron one final but quite small remnant of the patronate.[40] Even in Bombay the transition took place smoothly. According to the agreement just mentioned, the archbishop had to be alternately Portuguese and English. This stipulation put the Holy See in an embarrassing position, for in Bombay there were hardly any English and no Portuguese missionaries at all. In 1937 Rome had difficulty in finding a candidate. More in order to remove these difficulties than out of necessity, Archbishop Thomas Roberts, on the occasion of a visit to Rome in 1945, proposed that an Indian priest be given him as auxiliary bishop. The choice fell on Valerian Gracias, later the first Indian cardinal. Because he was an auxiliary bishop and not a coadjutor with the right of succession, Portugal could make no objections. If, sooner or later, the auxiliary bishop should be appointed ordinary—this was now the clear intention of Rome, and Archbishop Roberts was ready to resign in this case and surrender his position to the Indian bishop—the Portuguese government would be asked to renounce its privilege and not resist the indigenization of the Church in India. However, this was not to be necessary. In the mission treaty of 18 July 1950 Portugal renounced its rights in the nomination of the ordinaries of Mangalore, Quilon, Trichinopoly, Cochin, Saint Thomé (Saõ Thomé, Mylapore), and Bombay,[41] and on 4 December of the same year Gracias became archbishop. Pius XII created him a cardinal in the consistory of 12 January 1953.

---

[39] AAS 32 (1940), 379.

[40] Ibid. 20 (1928), 133.

[41] Ibid. 42 (1950), 811–15.

The mission treaty of 1950 had still other consequences. The bishops of Cochin and Mylapore were transferred to titular sees. In this way Rome obtained a free hand for the naming of the ordinaries of these former dioceses of the patronate. Cochin was divided into two new dioceses, Cochin and Alleppey, in accord with the two ethnic groups that had warred there with each other for centuries, and a broader territory, 130 kilometers from the rest of the former patronate diocese was separated and given to the bishop of Trivandrum as administrator. Likewise, the two heterogeneous and territorially widely separated parts of the patronate see of Meliapur were reconstructed ecclesiastically. The new dioceses of Tanjore and Vellore were erected, and the rest of the territories united to the archdiocese of Madras and Mylapore.

World War II did not produce for the Indian Church damage as great as had World War I. In general, missionary activity proceeded quietly. Only in Assam were material losses to be recorded. In 1945 the younger German and Italian missionaries, that is, those who had come after 1931, were temporarily interned. On 15 August 1947 the two independent states of India and Pakistan were founded. The result was that ecclesiastical territories were torn apart. Rome synchronized the diocesan boundaries with the political.

Meanwhile, the Indian missionary bishops had called into existence in 1944 the Catholic Bishops' Conference of India (CBCI).[42] The first Indian plenary council met at Bangalore from 6 to 18 January 1950. All ordinaries of the then fifty-two ecclesiastical circumscriptions of India, including the Archbishop of Goa and the bishops of the Eastern Rite in Malabar, who together represented 4.5 million Catholics, were present. It was a demonstration of the unity and compactness of the Indian Church, which publicly declared its loyalty to the new independent state. In the letter to Cardinal Norman Gilroy, archbishop of Sydney, whom Pius XII had appointed legate for the plenary council, the Roman purposes for the council were named: closer and uniform cooperation of the clergy among themselves and with the laity in all ecclesiastical and missionary questions; increase of the native clergy and improvement of its formation; building of Catholic Action; founding of a Catholic university; intensified care of charitable and educational institutions; promotion of the apostolate of the press. The conciliar decrees in keeping with these wishes were approved on 29 January 1952. They concerned not only regular pastoral care but also missionary radiation. In the latter relation the following means, in addition to the traditional ones, were recommended: appointment of a few priests who, equipped with a basic knowledge of the language, customs, philosophy, and religions of India, should assume apologetical and catechetical work among the educated; creation of a Catholic literature also for the Old Catholics which wholly and publicly represented Catholic doctrine and was also outstanding "in its literary and technical aspect"; proclaiming of Catholic teaching by means of radio broadcasts by priests and educated faithful; spread of the Church's social teaching, which was almost unknown in India; founding of a periodical for social questions, in connection with the Episcopal Conference; exercise of the apostolate also among Christians separated from the Church.[43] Further, at the plenary council the statutes of the Episcopal Conference were approved. The most striking sign and the greatest significance of this plenary council consists in the fact that the young Church of India began to adapt itself extensively to the traditional morals and customs of the country.

---

[42] The first common Episcopal Conference of India had taken place in 1921 under the chairmanship of Apostolic Delegate Pisani following the Marian Congress at Madras. At that time the idea of an Indian plenary council had arisen. However, various circumstances, including the frequent change of delegates, prevented the realization of the plan. When at last in 1937 everything was ready for the summoning, difficulties unexpectedly appeared because of the Portuguese patronate, so that the council had to be postponed. Pius XII later eliminated the latter difficulties by naming as legate for the council the cardinal of Sydney.

Other significant events for the mission Church of India were the following: In 1948 Pius XII established the internunciature of India.[44] On 26 January 1951 he declared the Mother of God patroness of the country.[45] At the close of the Marian Year there took place in Bombay a National Marian Congress from 4 to 8 December 1954 under the chairmanship of Cardinal Gracias; it was intended to express anew the vitality of the Catholic Church of India, and actually produced a great echo even in the non-Catholic public. Likewise at Bombay there was held in November 1964 the Thirty-Eighth Eucharistic Congress, which Pope Paul VI honored with his presence from 2 to 5 November.[46] The Pope's journey to India became an event of the greatest importance for both Church and secular history. Nine hundred eighty journalists and a television crew of seventy-seven gave every detail of the phenomenal reception and stay of the Pope in India worldwide publicity. Other landmarks of the new orientation of the young Church were the plenary assembly of the Indian hierarchy at New Delhi in 1966, an International Theological Conference at Nagpur in 1971, the celebration of the nineteenth centenary of the death of the Apostle Thomas at Madras in 1972, and the "All India Consultation on Evangelization" at Patna in 1973. From 14 to 25 May 1969 Bangalore was host of the "All India Seminar" for the renewal of the Church of India, which was equivalent to a "pastoral council." It was the climax of an exhaustive process of teaching and opinion formation. The great topics were: Indianization of the Church, self-support of the local Indian churches, and dialogue with the non-Christian religions.[47] A noteworthy contribution to the development of an Indian theology was promised by the new faculty of the study of religion, which was opened on 3 July 1976 at Dharmaram College in Bangalore.

---

[43] According to M. Bierbaum, "Das erste Plenarkonzil von Indien," ZMR 36 (Munich 1952), 161–72.

[44] AAS 42 (1950), 235. In August 1967 it was elevated to a nunciature with a pronuncio as titular.

[45] Ibid. 46 (1954), 398f.

[46] Ibid. 57 (1965), 113–40 (all details of the Pope's journey).

Through these and other manifestations the Catholic Church of India made itself a subject of conversation. Meetings, conferences, and seminars with important declarations found an international echo and "made obvious the desire for a revival and reorientation of ecclesiastical work."[48] Although a small minority, the Catholic Church in India is today a spiritual power, the results and importance of which cannot be expressed in numbers. In 1970 it published six daily newspapers, twenty ecclesiastical weeklies, and the two general weeklies, Sanjivan and Orbit. Catholic journalists are collaborators on the great daily and weekly papers of the country. The Indian clergy is numerous and through its good formation has gained greatly in quality and esteem. One of its most outstanding representatives, Archbishop Simon Lourdusamy of Bangalore, was called to Rome by Paul VI to direct the Dicastery for the Missions. The Indian congregations of sisters experienced a striking development, something of great importance, not only for the Church but for the whole nation, in a country where traditionally woman was accorded no place of honor. There are today in India twenty-three diocesan congregations of sisters and one female secular institute.[49] With the establishment of the first ashram at Kurisumala in 1957 began the adaptation of the contemplative life to Indian mentality and forms.

---

[47] Cf. Die katholischen Missionen (Freiburg 1970), 8–11. On the topic "dialogue" it should be noted that not too long ago it was still forbidden to learn Sanskrit and read books on Hinduism in major seminaries. The contact with Hinduism was regarded as a danger to the Christian faith. This attitude has changed radically in recent years due to the influence of the Second Vatican Council. The Catholic Church seeks better to understand Hinduism and to have a dialogue with its adherents.

[48] Herder-Korrespondenz 28 (Freiburg 1974), 7.

[49] "Supplementum" to the Bibliografia Missionaria, Anno XXXIX–1975, Quaderno no. 18 (Rome 1976), 32–37.

For all that, there has still been no success in bridging the abyss between Christianity and Hinduism. In the tradition-conscious Hindu circles Christianity is still regarded as foreign to Indian culture. This led in recent times to some deplorable obstacles for foreign missioners in some states, such as Assam. The Church hierarchy and the lay organizations leave nothing untried to remove the still existing prejudices and to eliminate all the bases for them. Above all, great exertions have been undertaken in the way of liturgical adaptation, as prescribed by the Second Vatican Council.

In 1978 the young Church of India consisted of eighty-three dioceses and two prefectures apostolic of the Latin Rite, seventeen dioceses of the Syro-Malabarese and two dioceses of the Syro-Malankarese Rites. The number of bishops—ordinaries, coadjutors, and auxiliaries—is 125. Three of them are cardinals. All except seven of the bishops are Indians. The number of the faithful of all three rites amounts to 10 million.

Pakistan

Large parts of the future West Pakistan belonged in ecclesiastical administration to the archdiocese of Bombay until 1948. After the founding of the independent Islamic nation of Pakistan, the diocese of Karachi was erected in West Pakistan on 20 May 1948. In East Pakistan—now Bangladesh—there had existed the diocese of Dacca since 1886. On 15 July 1950 Rome completed the ecclesiastical organization by the establishment of the ecclesiastical province of Karachi, with the suffragan sees of Multan, Lahore, and Rawalpindi, to which were added in 1958 Hyderabad and in 1960 Lyallpur, called Faisalabad since 1977, and that of Dacca, with the suffragan sees of Dinajpur and Chittagong, to which in 1952 was added Jesore, called Khulna since 1956.[50] No boundaries were determined for Kashmir and Jammu, for possession of which India and Pakistan were still fighting. Here on 17 January 1952 Rome erected instead the prefecture apostolic of Kashmir and Jammu, since 1968 called Jammu and Kashmir, and entrusted it to the Mill Hill Missionaries.[51] On the establishment of diplomatic relations with Pakistan, the delegation earlier erected in Karachi was on 9 October 1951 elevated to an internunciature, which on 27 December 1965 became a nunciature.[52]

The Islamic state of Pakistan guaranteed religious liberty in the constitution and assured the free exercise of religion by the religious minorities. Nevertheless, here as everywhere else in the Islamic world, the proclamation of the Christian faith encounters insurmountable difficulties. The episcopate always tried to solve emerging timely problems, such as the school question, by direct negotiations with the government. The foreseeable limitations on foreign missionaries were compensated by the opportune "Pakistanization" of the episcopate and the clergy. The elevation of the archbishop of Karachi, Joseph Cordeiro, to the College of Cardinals on 5 March 1973 was well received even by the non-Catholic population and the government. However, one cannot speak of an influence of the small Catholic minority on public life. All private colleges, including four Catholic, were nationalized in September 1972. In October of the same year the same fate overtook the Urdu schools in the Punjab and some English schools. There were in 1972 381,000 Catholics in a population of ca. 65 million.

---

[50] AAS 43 (1951), 66–69.

[51] Ibid. 44 (1952), 513f.

[52] Ibid. 42 (1950), 878f.; 44 (1952), 712f.; 58 (1966), 134.

Bangladesh

In Bangladesh, independent since 1971, the Catholic minority is very dynamic. It exercises its greatest influence in the sector of education. In 1976 it maintained 274 educational centers, a noteworthy achievement for a community of only 130,000 Catholics—today they number 142,000 in a population of 71.5 million. Among them were sixteen high schools. On 2 March 1973 Paul VI erected the nunciature of Bangladesh.[53]

Sri Lanka

Evangelization on Sri Lanka, the former Ceylon, which regards itself as the refuge of the original, unadulterated Buddhism, is chiefly in the hands of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, the Silvestrine Benedictines, and the Jesuits. They succeeded, in spite of some difficulties, in building a relatively strong Church and educating a numerous native clergy. Still, the process of transferring the direction of the Church to native hands began late.[54] Not until the partition of the archdiocese of Colombo and the founding of the new diocese of Chilaw on 5 January 1939 did the first native Oblate obtain an episcopal see. But he died before his episcopal ordination. In 1940 another native Oblate became his successor.

After the end of World War II Rome hastened to appoint a native of Sri Lanka, in fact a Singhalese bishop, as coadjutor with the right of succession. The choice fell on forty-four-year-old Thomas Benjamin

---

[53] Ibid. 65 (1973), 236.

[54] The bishop of Kandy, Beda Beekmeyer, O.S.B. Silv., appointed in 1912, was, it is true, born in Sri Lanka, but he came from a Dutch family which had lived in Sri Lanka for a little over a century.

Cooray, O.M.I., who later became Sri Lanka's first cardinal.[55] He became archbishop on 26 July 1947.

With the attainment of political independence on 4 February 1948, there began a campaign of harassment by Buddhist groups against the Catholic Church, which some intended to make responsible for the island's long colonial past. At first, this had as a consequence an "inferiority complex" on the part of Catholics, but the Church soon recovered from this. Rome continued to entrust the direction of the Church to native hands. Just the same, the young Church found it difficult to extend its missionary endeavors further. It increased practically only through natural growth. In 1958, of the 9.3 million inhabitants, 7.69 percent were Catholics. A large part of the native clergy was occupied in education and hence kept from the functions of evangelization. It is gratifying that at the insistence of Rome the clergy of Sri Lanka have since the 1960s undertaken foreign missions, first in Malaysia, then in India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh.

The Church received a new stimulus when on 22 February 1965 Archbishop Cooray became a cardinal. Under his chairmanship, the National Synod of 1968 sought to implement the directives of the Second Vatican Council in the Church of Sri Lanka. It courageously considered all the burning problems: cooperation between clergy and ordinaries, lay movements, religious instruction, liturgy, adaptation, and so forth, and decided for the elimination of the ghetto mentality of the Catholic Church within the nation, for positive collaboration in the national and cultural life, and for preparedness for cooperation with non-Christians in the solution of national problems.[56]

Nevertheless, the Church was not spared severe trials. In 1960 all private schools on Sri Lanka were nationalized. In 1964 the sisters assigned to state hospitals were removed. In January 1966 the government abolished the Christian Sunday and introduced the Buddhist Poya Day as the day of rest; it is computed according to the moon's phases. But this decision was annulled for economic considerations on 9 July 1971. Since Cooray's creation as a cardinal, the relations with the government have improved somewhat. On 11 December 1967 Rome established the apostolic delegation and on 6 September 1975 the apostolic nunciature of Sri Lanka.[57] On 4 December 1970 Paul VI stayed for three hours at the airport in Colombo on his return flight from Oceania and Australia. He was welcomed by 600,000 persons. The government, the Buddhists, Hindus, and Muslims had sent delegations. This papal visit contributed much to the improvement of the climate among the religious groups. Today the Catholic Church on Sri Lanka counts 965,000 members in a total population of 13 million, a fairly strong minority for Asiatic conditions.

---

[55] Session of the cardinals of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith of 10 December, audience of 13 (not 14) December 1945.

[56] Cf. Die katholischen Missionen, 23–25. An important contribution to the improvement of the climate between Catholics and Buddhists was made by Bishop Edmund Peiris, O.M.I., of Chilaw by means of his economic and historical researches and publications. He was regarded as the best informed on the culture and history of Sri Lanka and took part in a brisk exchange of scholarly ideas with learned Buddhists.

Vietnam

The plenary Council of Hanoi, 18 November to 6 December 1934, altered the course of the future of the young Churches of French Indochina—the states of Tonkin, Annam, Cochin China, Cambodia, Laos, and Siam. The most important subjects treated were: implementation of the new Codex iuris canonici and of the papal mission encyclicals, adaptation to the present time, guidelines for the mission to pagans, uniform missionary methods, relations of the foreign priests with the native clergy, learning of the national languages, study of the native religions and cultures, founding of native religious communities, use of the vernacular by the faithful at Mass, preparation of native priests for direction of the Church, wearing of Annamite dress by the clergy, and the lay apostolate.

The appointment of the native priest John Baptist Tong as coadjutor bishop of Phat-Diem and his ordination at Rome by Pius XI on 11 June 1933 was the first step on the way to a native Church, and others quickly followed. The French colonial power thwarted some of Rome's plans, but it was unable any longer to stop the development.[58]

The political occurrences during World War II and the succeeding wars for independence and above all the partition of Vietnam on 20 July 1954 inflicted atrocious injury on the mission Church. The political division altered at one stroke the religious and ecclesiastical picture of Vietnam. Ten vicariates apostolic lay in North Vietnam, six in South Vietnam. 875,000 inhabitants moved from the north to the south, 80 percent of whom, that is, 650,000, were Catholics. In South Vietnam the number of faithful tripled. The Church did everything it could to solve the burning social and religious problems of the refugees. Pastoral care among the now 1.4 million faithful had to be reorganized. This number grew powerfully in consequence of a movement of conversion that got under way in the next few years.

The Church undertook special exertions in the educational and social and charitable fields. In 1966 264,801 pupils were counted in the 1,158 elementary schools and 83,103 students in the 178 high schools. In 1959 the episcopate of South Vietnam founded the University of Da Lat, which was recognized by the state the same year. It was intended to make a new contribution to the intellectual construction of the country, especially in the educational and cultural sphere. Mathematics, chemistry, agriculture, technology, philosophy, literature, and education were the branches of knowledge here cultivated. In 1965 there followed the establishment of a theological faculty in the Papal Seminary of Pius X, also at Da Lat.

---

[57] AAS 67 (1975), 649.

[58] Cf. Memoria Rerum III/2, 507f.

In North Vietnam, on the contrary, the Church had to suffer more and more under Communist rule. All foreign missionaries were expelled in 1960. The activity of the native bishops and of the 200 remaining native priests was very greatly curtailed. The apostolic delegate since 1951, John Dooley, had to leave Hanoi because of sickness and was brought to the hospital at Phnom Penh. His vicar, Terence O'Driscoll, was expelled on 17 August 1959.

In South Vietnam there took place from 16 to 18 February 1959 at Saigon in the presence of the papal legate, Cardinal Gregory Peter Agagianian, the National Marian Congress, which was intended at the same time to celebrate the tercentenary of the nomination of the first vicars apostolic. Another important happening of the Jubilee Year was the establishment of the ecclesiastical hierarchy on 24 November 1960. Three ecclesiastical provinces were erected: in North Vietnam, Hanoi, with the suffragan sees of Lang Son, Hai Phong, Bac Ninh, Hung Hoa, Thai Binh, Bui Chu, Phat Diem, Than Hoa, and Vinh; in South Vietnam, Hué, with the suffragan sees of Qui Nhon, Nha Trang, and Kon Tum, and Saigon, with those of Vinh Long, Can Tho, Da Lat, My Tho, and Long Xuen. Hanoi and all dioceses in North Vietnam obtained native ordinaries, as did Saigon and all its suffragans and Hué and Qui Nhon.[59] Only Nha Trang and Kon Tum for the moment retained a foreign bishop. On the occasion of the establishment of the hierarchy, John XXIII sent a letter of congratulations to the Church in Vietnam on 14 January 1961.[60]

Pope Paul VI lost no opportunity to employ his prestige and diplomatic skill for the restoration of peace in Vietnam. In 1966 he sent the then apostolic delegate in Canada, Titular Archbishop Sergio Pignedoli, with a special message to the bishops meeting in Saigon.[61]

---

[59] AAS 53 (1961), 346–50.

[60] Ibid., 84–88.

[61] Ibid. 58 (1966), 911–14.

On 27 November 1970, on his flight from Dacca to Manila, he sent personal greetings to the governments in North and South Vietnam.

After the end of the thirty-years civil war, there began also for the part of the young Church in what had been South Vietnam a difficult time. In September 1975 twenty missioners were expelled from Da Lat. Thereafter the expulsion of foreign missionaries proceeded systematically.[62] The Church became more and more the "silent" Church. On 18 March 1976 Bishop Nguyên van Thuân, who had been appointed coadjutor of Saigon[63] before the seizure of power by the Communists, was imprisoned. He was regarded as one of the most capable bishops in Vietnam. He again obtained his freedom in July 1978. The archbishop of Hanoi, Joseph Marie Trin-nhu-Khuê, was created a cardinal by Paul VI in the consistory of 24 May 1976.[64] He received from the government permission for the journey to Rome.

Today the young Church in Vietnam numbers 2.8 million faithful in a total population of 47 million.

Laos

In Laos evangelization was carried out by members of the Paris Mission Seminary and French and Italian Oblates of Mary Immaculate. Despite encouraging starts, the mission still had not advanced beyond the initial stage in the 1950s. But at that time people felt they could speak of a wave of conversions among the animistic mountain tribes of the Meo and the Lao Theung in the uplands north of Vientiane; however, the political happenings impeded the evangelization of these peoples. Still, there arose a rather large number of Christian congregations which grew rapidly. But it was precisely the habitat of these mountaineers that became the field of operation of the Communist Pathet Lao. The part of the country occupied by them became inaccessible to the missionaries.

After South Vietnam had fallen at the end of April 1975 and Cambodia fourteen days later, Laos passed almost silently into the hands of the Communists in May. In the same month thirty French missionaries went to Thailand. In September twenty-nine Italian Oblates had to leave the country within three days.[65] Three native bishops and a dozen native priests remained behind under difficult conditions to care for some fifteen thousand faithful.

---

[62] Except for two members of the community of the "Little Brothers" of Charles de Foucauld and one of the "Little Sisters," all foreign missionaries were expelled up to 1976. The Church lost all its apostolic works, such as schools, student residences, orphanages, and hospitals. An exception was the Saint Paul Clinic in Ho Chi Minh City (Saigon).

[63] In 1967 he was made bishop of Nha Trang and on 24 April 1975 was appointed coadjutor of Saigon.

[64] AAS 68 (1976), 379.

[65] They are today active in other missions, especially in Indonesia and Senegal.

Cambodia

The most recent events had a still much more tragic impact on the little mission Church in Cambodia. The from time immemorial "little flock," which was for the most part composed of immigrant Vietnamese, was ever more decimated. The Catholics were branded as agents of a foreign religion. One who had himself baptized a Christian was called a traitor. This is related to the fact that there were scarcely 5,000 Catholics of Cambodian ancestry. Most of them were descendants of emancipated slaves of earlier times. Today Christianity has no more possibility of life in radical Cambodia. It has been effaced.

Thailand

The young Church in Buddhist Thailand, formerly Siam, had to suffer from various sorts of persecution in the 1930s and 1940s. Christianity was rejected as the religion of the colonial power. After World War II the situation improved somewhat. The repeated coups d'etat diverted people from church policy. In 1953 there were, among 18 million inhabitants, at most 85,000 Catholics, mostly Vietnamese and Chinese, seldom Thais. But missionary activity was tolerated. Today the young Church counts 174,000 faithful in a population of 41 million. On 18 December 1965 the ecclesiastical hierarchy was erected.[66]

Burma

The Second World War produced serious damage for the mission Church in Burma. On the occasion of the conquest of the country by the Japanese and of the reconquest, almost all mission works—churches, schools, mission stations—were destroyed. And there occurred local persecutions of Christians. The constitution of the nation, independent since 4 January 1948, guarantees religious liberty. This did not exclude certain restrictions, for example, in regard to the entry of foreign missioners. And the state claimed the sole right to educate the youth. In an effort to accommodate the strong national consciousness of the population and to remove prejudices against Catholics, Rome pushed from 1954 for the transfer of the direction of the Church to native bishops. The ecclesiastical hierarchy was established on 1 January

---

[66] AAS 58 (1966), 554–56. Two ecclesiastical provinces were erected: Bangkok and Thare Nonseng with three suffragans each. Meanwhile, two other dioceses were established.

1955.[67] There were at that time, among 16 million inhabitants, only about 150,000 Catholics. Among them, however, were scarcely any Burmese, who professed Buddhism exclusively. Only the animistic mountain tribes of the original population were accessible to evangelization, as were immigrant Indians and Chinese. From 1966 to 1970 no less than 262 Catholic missionaries were expelled in keeping with the general tendency of the government to eliminate antinational influences as far as possible. Schools and charitable institutions were for the most part expropriated and nationalized. Residence permits were withdrawn from all missionaries who had entered after 1948. Nevertheless, the young Church is growing. Today it numbers 331,000 faithful in a population of 28 million.

The Malay Peninsula

The political changes on the Malay Peninsula repeatedly demanded the transformation of the ecclesiastical organization from the middle of this century.[68] At the same time Rome desired by its measures to give a new stimulus to the Catholic mission, to take into account the ethnic circumstances, to introduce the transfer of church government to native hands, to remove the basis for the ever louder complaints that the Catholic Church is not supranational but bound to the Western colonial powers, and finally to show the people that the Holy See understands and fosters the struggle of colonial peoples for independence. Today there are on the peninsula two ecclesiastical provinces, with two archdioceses and two suffragans each and the archdiocese of Singapore, which is immediately subject to the Holy See. The number of the faithful in this area amounts to 436,000.

Indonesia

To follow the evangelization and ecclesiastical organization on the 3,000 islands of modern Indonesia in all details would go beyond the scope of this work. We must limit ourselves here to some points which appear important to us. After World War II, during which 120 missionaries had been killed in Indonesia, the missionary activity was at once resumed. The new regime put no obstacles in the way, although most of the missionaries were Dutch; on the contrary, it valued their work, especially in education.

---

[67] AAS 47 (1955), 263–66. Two ecclesiastical provinces were erected: Rangoon with two dioceses and a prefecture apostolic, and Mandalay with one diocese and one prefecture. Today there are in Burma two archdioceses and one prefecture.

[68] Cf. AAS 47 (1955), 433–35, and 65 (1973), 126–28.

On 7 July 1947 Rome erected an apostolic delegation for Indonesia. On 15 March 1950 it was elevated to an internunciature and on 7 December 1965 to a nunciature.[69]

In 1960 Rome felt the time had arrived to erect an ecclesiastical hierarchy in Indonesia. As reasons for this were named: recognition of the missionary successes of the last years, contribution to the gratification of the strong nationalist stirrings in Indonesia, greater prestige of the Catholic Church with the government and the people. It was hoped by this measure to supply a new stimulus to evangelization in the island nation. And so on 3 January 1961 John XXIII established six ecclesiastical provinces with a total of twenty-five archdioceses and dioceses.[70] The metropolitan sees of Jakarta and Semarang received native archbishops.

After the United Nations had on 1 May 1963 given the former Dutch New Guinea, now West Irian, to Indonesia for administration, Rome decided on 10 November 1966 to establish the ecclesiastical hierarchy here too. The province of Merauke with two suffragan sees was formed.[71] With the creation on 26 June 1967 of the archbishop of Semarang, Justin Darmojuwono (since 1963), as the first Indonesian cardinal, Paul VI honored the Indonesian mission Church and the entire island population.[72]

All these young Churches of Asia have their own episcopal conferences, which boldly keep an eye on the current tasks and problems of the formation of dynamic individual Churches and seek to solve them by the most far-reaching adaptation to the traditional national circumstances, morals, and customs. In addition, all these episcopal conferences have joined in the Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences (F.A.B.C.), whose statutes were approved ad experimentum by Rome on 6 December 1972. It held its first plenary meeting at Taipei from 21 to 27 April 1974, and at this new stresses were placed on the great themes: local church, dialogue with other world religions, aid for the development of the Church, ecclesiastical renewal, liturgical adaptation.[73] The vitality of the young Churches in Asia and their desire for cultural accommodation are likewise attested to by the very numerous native religious communities of diocesan right, which were founded everywhere in the last few years and decades.[74]

---

[69] Ibid. 39 (1947), 468, 618f.; 42 (1950), 434; 58 (1966), 132f.

[70] Ibid. 53 (1961), 244–48; cf. ibid., 296–99 (the Pope's message of greeting).

[71] Ibid. 59 (1967), 483f., date: 15November.

[72] Ibid. 59 (1967), 714.

[73] Cf. Die katholischen Missionen (1974), 167f.

The Young Churches in Africa

Evangelization on the African continent in the second half of this century was at last able, free from the bonds of colonialism, to embrace all the African peoples and tribes and their cultures credibly and successfully and lead to the founding of native Churches, which offered to the struggling young nations now achieving independence their help for the achievement of intellectual and material progress and the furtherance of peace and justice. The 1950s became, from the missionary viewpoint, the "Decade of Africa." If in 1950 all of Africa, so to say, was still under colonial rule, at the end of 1960 two-thirds of the African population lived in independent states. If in 1950 there were only two African bishops, at the beginning of 1960 there were already twenty-two. In the consistory of 28 March 1960 John XXIII created the first African cardinal.

The missionary development not only made progress with the political and social, but in its own way contributed to prepare for and fostered the political and social development. This notion is expressed repeatedly in the documents of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. By means of the most important measures, such as the erection of an ecclesiastical hierarchy, the naming of African bishops, the Africanization of the Church, rearrangement of apostolic delegations, and so forth, Rome intentionally sought to approve and promote the independence movement of the African peoples. In the social sphere there appeared most unambiguously the contribution of the mission to the emancipation of the African woman, which it had helped to prepare by admitting black girls to religious institutes and by founding native congregations of sisters. At the same time this was a necessary precondition for the implanting of Christianity, for the social and cultural depression of the African woman was the "chief impediment to a permanent Christianization of the people."[75]

The external missionary development of Africa in this period is expressed in the following statistics: In 1922 the African mission Church, in so far as it was subject to the jurisdiction of the Roman missionary officials, was divided into 50 vicariates apostolic, 28 prefectures apostolic, and 4 missions. On 31 December 1972 there existed in the same area 43 archdioceses, 236 dioceses, 15 vicariates apostolic, 21 prefectures apostolic, 1 prelacy, 1 apostolic administration, hence a total of 317 ecclesiastical territories. In 1978 there were on the entire African continent and its islands 49 metropolitan sees, 269 dioceses, 13 vicariates apostolic, 14 prefectures apostolic, 2 apostolic administrations, 1 prelacy, and 17 jurisdictions immediately subject to the Holy See, that is, they belong to no ecclesiastical province; there are also 2 patriarchates and 6 dioceses of Churches of the Eastern Rites. Altogether, there are 373 ecclesiastical territories. Of the 335 "Latin" bishops, 237 are Africans. Twelve belong to the College of Cardinals, and, of these, one, Bernardin Gantin, is a curial cardinal at Rome, president of the papal commission Iustitia et Pax. To follow this grand-scale development in detail is not possible within the limits of this work. Here, even more than in the Asiatic mission area, we must confine ourselves to the striking events and measures pointing the way.[76]

---

[74] "Supplementum" to the Bibliografia Missionaria, Anno XXXIX–1975, Quaderno no. 18 (Rome 1976), 20–52.

[75] L. Kilger, O.S.B., "Watawa-schwarze Schwestern," NZM 1 (Schöneck 1945), 113–17.

For the gradual Africanization of the Church Rome referred extensively to the cooperation of the missionary orders, congregations, and societies. Only where these were intent on training a native clergy could native ordinaries be appointed and entrusted with the government of the Churches. As early as 1925 Rome thought it could take the first step in this direction. But the plans could not be implemented until 1938. Pius XI gave the stimulus to this. In an audience of 24 May he said to the secretary of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, Celso Costantini: "Will Divine Providence grant me the joy of ordaining an African bishop at Saint Peter's in Rome? The missions in Africa list today the most productive harvest in conversions."[77] In June of the same year he told Costantini that it was his "lively desire" to ordain an African bishop; he wished thereby on the one hand to reward and crown the activity of the foreign missioners in Africa and on the other hand to give a new impetus to the missions there. The preparations began at once, but it was only allowed to Pius XII on 29 October 1939 to ordain at Rome the first two African bishops of modern times,[78] together with ten other missionary bishops, including one Chinese and one Indian.[79]

---

[76] For more details cf. Memoria Rerum III/2, 519–43.

[77] Agenzia Fides (1939), no. 704–NI 211/39.

[78] There had already been a native African bishop in 1518: Henrique, son of the King of the Congo (cf. BM XV, 283). There is a report of another African bishop in N. Kowalsky, O.M.I., "Tobia Ghebragzer. Ein 'schwarzer' Bischof im 18. Jahrhundert," NZM 15 (Schöneck 1959), 198–204.

[79] AAS 31 (1939), 595–98 (the Pope's homily).

Another Roman decision about this time speaks clearly for the desire to Africanize the Church. In the Congo there had emerged a "question of rites." It had to do with supplanting of pagan burial ceremonies by Christian. The missionaries had sought to eradicate the entire pagan burial rite, which was called Matanga. However, they ran into resistance from the population. The faithful regarded themselves as bound from social motives to take part in the burial of their pagan countrymen and hence in those rites. No one observed the prohibition of the missionaries. Now in fact the Matanga consisted partly of superstitions, but also partly of completely indifferent usages. The Roman missionary office was asked for information. Appealing to the instruction of 1659,[80] this approved the plan of a "Christian Matanga," as the apostolic delegate and the bishops of the Congo had proposed. However, Rome advised the ordinaries, in connection with the drawing up of Christian burial ceremonies, to have regard for the customs that differed from tribe to tribe. This first step was followed after the Second Vatican Council by many others in the same sense in the area of liturgical adaptation.

In the 1950s the Africanization of the Church consistently progressed in the area of the transfer of ecclesiastical government to native hands. Gradually native bishops were named everywhere: Tanganyika in 1950,[81] Ruanda in 1952, Basutoland (now Lesotho) in 1952, South Africa in 1954, Sudan in 1955, Cameroon in 1955, Upper Volta in 1956, Belgian Congo (now Zaire) in 1956, Kenya in 1956, Nigeria in 1957, Ghana in 1957, and Togo in 1962.

Hence at the close of the "African Decade" twelve African nations and Madagascar had the first native bishops, and the process of transferring the government of the Church was in full swing. Furthermore, the regular ecclesiastical hierarchy was introduced in these and other countries. The 1960s saw the rise of the first African prelates into the College of Cardinals: in 1960 Laurean Rugambwa, bishop of Rutabo; in 1965 Paul Zoungrana, archbishop of Ouagadougou, and Owen McCann, archbishop of Cape Town, a white South African, also Léon-Étienne Duval, archbishop of Algiers, and Stephanos I Sidarouss, Coptic patriarch of Alexandria; in 1969 Joseph Malula, archbishop of Kinshasa, and Jérôme Rakotomalala, archbishop of Tananarive. In the 1970s followed: in 1973 Émile Biayenda, archbishop of Brazzaville, and Maurice Otunga, archbishop of Nairobi; in 1976 Hyacinthe Thiandoum, archbishop of Dakar, Victor Razafimahatratra, S.J., archbishop of Tananarive, Emmanuel Nsubuga, archbishop of Kampala, and Dominic Ignatius Ekandem, bishop of Ikot Ekpene; and in 1977 Bernardin Gantin.

---

[80] The latest edition of this important instruction for the attitude of the Roman mission authorities in questions of conduct in regard to native cultures from the earliest times of the mission dicastery in Memoria Rerum III/2, 696–704.

[81] The year of the appointment of the first native bishop is given in each instance.

The second feature which gave its stamp to the "Decade of Africa" and brought the Africanization of the Church a good bit further was the erection of the regular ecclesiastical hierarchy in the mission Churches of the continent. There were good reasons for the introduction of the new mission organization. There was a desire to return to the earlier practice of the Church. The structure based on prefectures and vicariates was determined by history and had only a temporary character, and the reasons on which it was supported had for a long time had no further foundation.[82] Further, account was to be taken of the rapid progress of the African mission Church in the most recent period; the missionaries should be compensated for their efforts, and greater authority should be given to the ordinaries. Since the Anglican Church and the Protestant denominations were appointing bishops and archbishops who stood in great repute among the African population, the Catholic Church must not hold back. A further important reason, cited again and again in the documents, was the regard for the striving for independence of the African peoples. This demand should be intentionally encouraged, and it should be shown to the African peoples as well as to the whole world that Rome considered these peoples as mature enough to rule themselves. It was also not unknown in Rome that the Africans attributed a colonial character to the missions—even if incorrectly, at least as regards the missions of the Roman Dicastery—or imagined in them a pseudo-colonial appearance, and these in fact awakened in many the impression of a "religious colonization," because they were still to a great extent in the hands of foreign personnel. Hence the "old missions" should be replaced by "new missions," which were directed by natives.

The first step in the new direction was taken in 1950 in British West Africa, that is, in Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast (now Ghana), Nigeria, British Togo, and British Cameroon. Gambia was excluded, since there was only a missio sui iuris with few Catholics. On 28 April 1950 three ecclesiastical provinces were erected in this area, together with twelve bishoprics.[83] In addition to the already mentioned general reasons, in this case the following were also decisive for the erection of the hierarchy: the favorable missionary situation, the good prospects for the future, the rapidly increasing number of native priests,[84] the planned pilgrimage of several missionary bishops from West Africa to Rome for the Holy Year in May 1950, which it was intended to publicize in connection with the erection of the hierarchy, the previous nomination of an Anglican archbishop, and finally the desire of the British colonial government to see archbishops at the head of the Catholic Church as partners in negotiations.

---

[82] Cf. N. Kowalsky, O.M.I., "Zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der Apostolischen Vikare," NZM 13 (Schöneck 1957), 271–86; also, Memoria Rerum I/1, 353–438; II, 220–34.
[83] AAS 42 (1950), 615–19.

On 11 January 1951 there occurred the establishment of the regular ecclesiastical hierarchy in South Africa, in Basutoland (Lesotho), and Swaziland (Ngwane). Four ecclesiastical provinces with twenty-one jurisdictions were constituted.[85] The archbishops of Cape Town, Durban, and Pretoria and the bishops of Johannesburg and Keimoes were South Africans of white ancestry. The special national character of this country brought it about that as yet no native black bishops could be named. However, less than two years later Rome began in Basutoland the transfer of the government of the Church to native bishops. And even in the Union of South Africa, today the Republic of South Africa, the government of the Church could not continue exclusively in the hands of the white clergy. As in all Africa, there too the national and self-consciousness of the Bantu peoples was gaining strength. They felt it to be humiliating that there were so few black priests, and were inclined to assign the guilt for this to the white missioners, whom they suspected of not giving the blacks credit for being able to have their own priests and bishops. With the division of the diocese of Mariannhill, the erection of the Zulu diocese of Umzimkulu, and the naming of the Mariannhill priest Bonaventura Dlamini in 1954, Rome wanted to accommodate the justified aspirations. However, further steps in this direction have to wait a long time.

In the South African mission Church the government's apartheid policy became a serious problem. The racial problem had begun practically with the first settlement by whites on the Cape and had become ever more serious and inflammatory from generation to generation, until, after World War II, it was, so to speak, made into a system by the government under the pretense of "separate development." What most irritated the black population and the half-castes and produced world publicity were the social injustices and vexations which made the entire apartheid policy of the government, including its not to be undervalued good aims, unworthy of credence. A compromise became more and more impossible. In official documents the bishops repeatedly took a stand against the injustices. The declaration issued by the Episcopal Conference in July 1957 deserves notice.[86] The archbishop of Durban, Denis Eugene Hurley, O.M.I., especially stood up fearlessly for the rights of the colored population. As a South African by birth, he could do more in this respect.

---

[84] In eastern Nigeria there were then: 479,840 Catholics, 260,277 catechumens, 230 foreign and 15 native priests; in western Nigeria: 176,807 Catholics, 42,198 catechumens, 203 foreign and 16 native priests; in the third province were 293,646 Catholics, 50,603 catechumens, 173 foreign and 12 native priests.

[85] AAS 43 (1951), 257–63.

Another trial of strength between the mission Church and the government took place in the school question. Because of the withdrawal of state support and the bishops' "no" to the nationalization of the schools, these came into sad financial distress. The two vicars apostolic of Windhoek and Keetmanshoop in South-West Africa, or Namibia, found a happier solution.

On 25 March 1953 Rome also established the ecclesiastical hierarchy in the countries of Kenya, Uganda, and Tanganyika in British East Africa, about ten years before these states obtained their political independence.[87] Four new ecclesiastical provinces with twenty-three bishoprics were founded.[88] There followed the erection of the hierarchy in Southern Rhodesia on 1 January 1955—one province with five jurisdictions[89]—and in French colonial Africa and Madagascar on 14 September of the same year—eleven provinces with thirty-eight archdioceses and dioceses.[90] On the same date, 14 September 1955, the vicariate apostolic of Rabat in Morocco became an archdiocese,[91] the vicariate apostolic of Ghardaïa in Algeria became the diocese of Laghouat,[92] and the prefecture apostolic of Jibuti in the then [86] "Christianisme et ségrégation raciale (Déclaration collective des Évêques d'Afrique du Sud)," Église Vivante IX (Louvain 1957), 339–44. La Documentation Catholique, 39 Anneé T. LIV (Paris 1957), col. 1321–26.

---

[87] Kenya then counted, in a population of 5.4 million, 365,021 Catholics, 59,164 catechumens, 256 foreign and 14 native priests; Uganda: 1,134,057 Catholics out of 5 million inhabitants, 115,706 catechumens, 360 foreign and 133 native priests; Tanganyika: 785,677 Catholics out of 7.4 million inhabitants, 92,591 catechumens, 626 foreign and 134 native priests.

[88] AAS 45 (1953), 705–10.

[89] Ibid. 47 (1955), 292f. (the Pope's greeting of 24 April 1955). The number of Catholics amounted to 100,000 Bantu and 13,500 whites. There were 168 priests, 17 native seminarians, and 50 pupils in the minor seminary. The future prospects of the mission could be regarded as good, as the number of 20,000 catechumens shows.

[90] AAS 48 (1956), 113–19.

[91] In 1956 the diocese of Tangiers was erected here and made directly subject to the Holy See.

[92] Algiers, Constantine, and Oran are not subject to the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

French Somaliland, now, since 27 June 1977, the independent Republic of Djibouti, was likewise raised to a diocese and immediately made subject to the Holy See.[93]

Now only three quite large parts of Africa were without the normal ecclesiastical hierarchy: the Delegation Area of the Congo, British Central Africa, and the Sudan. It was introduced in the first two in 1959, in the Sudan in 1974. On 25 April 1959 Rome formed the two ecclesiastical provinces of Lusaka and Blantyre with five and three suffragan sees respectively.[94] The Belgian Congo, Ruanda, and Burundi were on the threshold of their political independence. Rome aspired to prepare the historical turning point by a series of ecclesiastical measures. The first concern was the appointment of a native auxiliary bishop for the future capital of the country. It was high time. The Catholic Church appeared to many Congolese as a foreign, colonial institution and was rejected by them. Hence on 2 July 1959 John XXIII appointed Joseph Malula as auxiliary bishop of Léopoldville, now Kinshasa.[95] On the same day the newly established vicariate apostolic of Goma was turned over to the native clergy. But the most important and striking event, whereby Rome wanted to assure the Congolese people of their readiness for greater independence was the erection of the ecclesiastical hierarchy on 10 November 1959 in the Belgian Congo and Ruanda-Urundi, now Ruanda and Burundi.[96] Eight ecclesiastical provinces with as many archdioceses and twenty-nine dioceses were formed.[97] Finally there occurred in the Sudan the establishment of the Church hierarchy, after the calming of the political situation, on 18 November 1974 with the formation of two provinces and a total of seven sees.[98]

---

[93] AAS 48 (1956), 113–19.

[94] Ibid. 51 (1959), 793–96. In Northern Rhodesia there were in 1958 385,485 Catholics, 71,505 catechumens, 284 foreign and 29 native priests in a total population of 2.1 million. In Nyasaland (Malawi), with 2.5 million inhabitants, the statistics are similar: 429,150 Catholics, 51,696 catechumens, 224 foreign and 50 native missioners.

[95] On 7 July 1964 Malula became archbishop of the capital and in the consistory of 28 April 1969 he was created a cardinal.

[96] As early as 1952 this measure had been mentioned. The establishment of the hierarchy was to be included in the new mission agreement between the Holy See and Belgium. But the Belgian Senate refused assent when the treaty came into existence on 8 December 1953.

[97] AAS 52 (1960), 372–77. In the Congo there were in a population of 13 million 4.3 million Catholics and 700,000 catechumens, 2,272 foreign and 298 native priests. Remarkable was the increase in native priests, as regards both their number and their training. Ecclesiastical institutions—schools, hospitals, and so forth—were well organized. A still better picture emerges from the statistics of Ruanda-Urundi: 1.6 million Catholics out of 4.5 million inhabitants, more than 500,000 catechumens, 163 native and 329 foreign priests.

[98] AAS 67 (1975), 164f.

With the setting up of the ecclesiastical hierarchy on the African continent a long historical development had come to an end. A new epoch of history had begun. Out of the mission Churches had come "Young Churches," young particular Churches. True, their missionary status endured and still continues. But now, as equally competent member Churches, they stand beside those in Europe, America, and Asia. Furthermore, they depend on the personal and material support of other member Churches. The foreign missionaries accustomed themselves to work and evangelize under native bishops. This must be reckoned to their credit. Difficulties were not wanted in the period of transition. The point of departure for the future development of the Young Churches of Africa was laid.

We designated the 1950s as the "Decade of Africa" in regard to the Africanization of the Church, the transfer of church government to African bishops, and the establishment of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The 1960s also set a special mark on the young African Churches: the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Holy See and most of the African states that had achieved independence, and the reorganization of the apostolic delegations. The missionary organization and development had to keep pace with the rapidly advancing political, social, cultural, and economic upheavals of the African peoples in these years, which in an increasing measure gained influence on world politics. Vestiges of the colonial past had to be definitively obliterated. And so in 1960 a reorganization of the apostolic delegations in Africa was undertaken. Out of the two previous delegations of Nairobi and Dakar were formed four delegations: Nairobi for East Africa, Dakar for West Africa, Lagos for west central Africa, and Tananarive for Madagascar.[99] John XXIII and to a greater degree Paul VI entered into direct diplomatic relations with the African states as they became autonomous.[100]

Not all African states have honored the loyal attitude of the Church, its aid in the conflict-filled transition from the colonial epoch to political independence, and its not insignificant contribution to the securing of domestic peace. Often the new states had received the constitution of a Western democracy, which did not sufficiently take into account the African circumstances and mentality. Hence almost all states had inner crises to overcome. The disturbances often passed into the relations of the government of the moment with the church authorities or with the Church as such. The African hierarchy worked to mediate and to give to the African peoples a new life-style based on respect for the natural rights of persons and on social justice and love. Still, in the 1960s and 1970s there occurred in several independent states of Black Africa severe conflicts between the heads of governments and church dignitaries.

---

[99] Ibid 52 (1960), 1000–1003.

[100] For the individual countries and dates see Memoria Rerum III/2, 536f.

In 1964 all European missionaries were expelled from the southern provinces of the Sudan; 278 Catholic and 28 Protestant missioners were affected. Only 32 native priests remained to care for 400,000 faithful. This was the result of the conflict between the more than 10 percent Christian southern provinces and the Arab population of the northern provinces. Not until 1971 could the first white missionaries—6 Jesuits—return to this area. Somewhat later 11 white sisters followed. A visit by the secretary of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, Archbishop Sergio Pignedoli, to Khartoum in July 1968 and his personal contacts had prepared the way for the new government to be reasonable.

In 1967 the president of Guinea expelled all foreign priests and sisters on the pretext that they were preventing the Africanization of the Church. In December 1970 he had the archbishop of Conakry put on trial because of participation in a coup d'etat allegedly staged by Portuguese Guinea and condemned to compulsory labor for life.[101] In 1974 Guinea gave occasion for guarded optimism. For the first time the president received a delegation of African missionaries.

Missioners were also expelled from Burundi, Gabon, Uganda, Rhodesia, and South Africa. In Somalia on 13 January 1963 missioners were forbidden by law to make any sort of direct "propaganda" for Christian religions. In his message for the third anniversary of the revolution on 21 October 1972 President Siad Barre announced the nationalization of all private schools and printing companies. This measure especially hurt the mission work of the Catholic Church. Now the Church can be active there only in the charitable and social fields.

In Lesotho the Church was involved against its will in the domestic political partisan strife. The loyal and skillful conduct of the archbishop of Maseru was able to keep undesirable consequences away from the missions. The common difficulties in this country led to a more intimate collaboration of all Christian Churches. Since then, ecumenical relations have been quite exemplary.

During the two-and-one-half-year civil war in Nigeria against secessionist Biafra, the Church was in a difficult position. It was accused of supporting the rebels. After the war's end foreign missionaries were imprisoned and banished. In 1971 Nigeria experienced a special success in the Africanization of the Church: seven native bishops were appointed.

---

[101] Cf. Die katholischen Missionen (1970), 26–28.

In Equatorial Guinea, the former Spanish colony that became independent on 12 October 1968, there were very soon tensions between the new president and the Church. In April 1971 the Spanish bishop of Santa Isabel (Malabo since 1974) was driven from the country. The government gave no reasons for this. More even than the foreign Claretians, the native priests had to let caution prevail, since sinister political intentions were easily imputed to them. Finally, religious worship was totally forbidden, all churches were closed, the last foreign priests, except for an eighty-year-old one in Bata, were expelled in July 1978. There remained in the country only the twenty native priests. World public opinion veiled itself in silence over the tragedy which has been playing there since 1969.

Serious situations of conflict appeared also in Zaire. During student disturbances in June 1969 at the Catholic Lovanium University in Kinshasa, founded in 1954, several students were killed. A renewed protest by the students on the second anniversary of this occurrence was for the government the occasion to close the university and conscript all students, including religious sisters, into military service. In the next school year teaching was resumed with new students, but now it was called the University of Kinshasa. A little later a real struggle against the Church broke out. Freedom of meeting in churches was strictly curtailed by several harsh decrees. The entire institutional Church saw itself threatened in its potential for action. The cardinal archbishop of Kinshasa had to leave the country for a while. Christian baptismal names were forbidden, instruction in the Christian religion was proscribed in all schools. Finally, however, the conflict was settled.[102]

In Burundi the Church had to suffer much during the mass murder of more than 100,000 members of the Hutu tribe in 1972. On 13 April 1977 all eleven Verona Fathers active there and some Italian mission helpers were expelled, evidently because they had protected the Hutu in the bloody civil war. Also in Uganda there occurred tensions between government and Church. In December 1972 a papal delegation, under the leadership of the cosecretary of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, Bernardin Gantin, went to Uganda to settle the conflict. It was received by the president on 19 December. Here, too, relations improved later. Still, again and again unpleasant events occurred. In Malawi the president had the major seminary in Kachebere closed temporarily in April 1973, because his picture, which had been hung there, had been defaced, and the perpetrator could not be ascertained. The seminary was, it is true, reopened for the Malawi candidates for the priesthood, but the seminarians from Zambia and Mozambique had to leave the country.

---

[102] Cf. ibid., (Freiburg 1972), 91–94, 126f.

In December 1970 the Cameroonian Bishop Albert Ndongmo of N'Kongsamba was tried by a military court for an allegedly attempted coup d'etat and participation in a conspiracy to murder the president, and condemned to death. The verdict was reduced by the president to life imprisonment. The bishop was pardoned on 14 May 1975. Since then he has lived in Canada.

In Rhodesia the tension between Church and state was intensified by the government's discriminatory racial policy, about which the Church could not be silent. On Palm Sunday 1970 in a daring pastoral letter the bishops announced that they had decided to disregard certain aspects of the new constitution and that, because of their convictions of faith, they would not trouble themselves about those laws which clearly contradicted the gospel message. As early as June 1969 the five Catholic bishops of the nation had protested against the government's racial policy. On 1 October 1976 Bishop Donal Lamont of Umtali was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment at hard labor because of his open letter of 11 August to the government, in which he had censured the racial policy. On 23 March 1977 he was banished. The appointment of the new black archbishop of Salisbury on 31 May 1976 was greeted by world opinion as a courageous step by Rome. Terrorist acts of the independence movement brought great damage to the mission in the most recent period. In the twelve months from June 1977 to June 1978 thirty-six missioners were killed by terrorists.

The Portuguese possessions in Africa were, until their independence—Guinea-Bissau on 10 September 1974, Mozambique on 25 July 1975, Cape Verde Islands on 6 July 1975, São Tomé and Príncipe on 12 July 1975, and Angola on 11 November 1975—late relics of a long-past colonial age. Despite its involvement with the colonial power, the Church did not neglect the evangelization of these lands and islands. But its activity in the service of the spreading of the Gospel was overshadowed and seriously burdened by the fact that it supported a system which, appealing to the expansion of Portuguese Catholic civilization, denied the people freedom and independence. It there came under the fire of public opinion. In the mission agreement of 7 May 1940[103] between the Holy See and Portugal the interests of the Church were defined, but at the same time it was anchored in the colonial system. On 25 July 1953 the first native priest was ordained in Mozambique, Alexandre José Maria dos Santos, O.F.M., who in 1974 became bishop of Maputo, formerly Lourenço Marques. Thereafter the formation of the native clergy in the Portuguese overseas possessions was more encouraged. The independence movements, appearing everywhere, opened the eyes of prelates and clergy. Some of these came into opposition to the colonial government. Finally consideration was given to the construction of native local Churches. This development was further intensified after the Second Vatican Council. However, there remained the connection of the Church with the state, and the Roman Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, which, according to the mission decree of the council, should alone be competent "for all missions and all missionary activity,"[104] was for the future excluded from evangelization in the Portuguese overseas territories. Only after independence did it take over the direction of the mission Churches there. The rightly differently evaluated departure of the White Fathers from Mozambique in May 1971[105]—a unique incident in mission history—took place on the grounds that the political situation did not guarantee an integral proclamation of the faith.

---

[103] AAS 32 (1940), 217–44; A. Mercati, Raccolta di Concordati II, 232–64; literature also in BM XXIII, no. 872.

After political independence the Church was pulled into the whirlpool of events. On 25 July 1975, exactly one month after independence, following a speech by the president, there began the nationalization of all ecclesiastical institutions in Mozambique. As grounds for this were cited the earlier support of the Church by the state and the fact that all these institutions actually belonged to the people. The government made no secret of its struggle against the Church. Half of all foreign priests left the country. Rome at once began to put the government of the mission Churches in these countries into native hands. For example, in Mozambique seven of thirty-five native priests were appointed and ordained bishops. From 9 to 13 September 1977 a National Pastoral Assembly was held in Beira. It was, so to speak, an inventory after two years of political independence. Guidelines were set up for the future pastoral care of the faithful and further evangelization. In Angola the twelve bishops, in a common pastoral letter of 14 December 1977, appealed to the government to respect the rights of religion. They admonished the faithful to stand firm in the faith and to work in peace for the welfare of the nation.[106] A reply of the government to this was obviously the expropriation of the radio station, Radio Ecclesiae, on 25 January, which had earlier to suspend its broadcasts. From 4 to 8 April 1978 the bishops of Angola held a plenary meeting, the outcome of which was again a common pastoral letter.[107]

---

[104] Ad Gentes 29 in AAS 58 (1966), 980.

[105] Cf. Die katholischen Missionen (Freiburg 1971), 161–65.

[106] Internationaler Fides-Dienst 18. Januar 1978, 28–31.

As regards organization, there are today three ecclesiastical provinces in Angola: Luanda with four, Huambo with three, and Lubango with two suffragan sees; in Mozambique, the ecclesiastical province of Maputo with eight suffragans; the dioceses of Bissau and São Tomé and Príncipe are immediately subject to the Holy See; and the diocese of Cape Verde is a suffragan of Lisbon. Two of the eleven bishops of Angola are foreigners. One hundred native and 223 foreign priests, 8 native and 22 foreign brothers, 250 native and 350 foreign sisters are active in Angola. They are supported by 20,000 native catechists.[108] The number of Catholics amounts to ca. 3 million, which is half the population of the country. In Mozambique there are 1.5 million Catholics, or 18 percent of the population.

On 7 December 1974 the Holy See erected an apostolic delegation in Mozambique,[109] on 30 December 1974 in Guinea-Bissau,[110] and on 25 February 1975 in Angola.[111]

And here too some highlights of other, hitherto not yet or hardly mentioned young Churches of Africa, though unfortunately completeness must be waived. The young Churches in Egypt and Ethiopia have a special status and must follow special laws. They stand in the same position as the Orthodox Eastern Churches. In so far as they have Eastern Rites, they are under the jurisdiction of the Roman Congregation for the Eastern Churches. Likewise subject to it are all the vicariates apostolic of the Latin Rite in Egypt and the vicariate of Asmara in Ethiopia. Only the vicariates of Gimma and Harrar and the prefectures of Awasa and Hosanna in Ethiopia depend on the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples. In 1938 Pius XI had clearly defined the jurisdiction of these two Roman dicasteries, which until then overlapped.[112] The conquest and occupation of Ethiopia by Italy in 1936 posed new problems and tasks for Rome and the young Church of this country. Their solution was made still harder by the fact that the Italian government, unasked, expressed desires which it wanted to see observed in the reorganization of the ecclesiastical situation. World War II brought new and great damage to the Church in Ethiopia. On 28 November 1942 100 missionaries, 300 sisters, two vicars apostolic, and one prefect were expelled and repatriated to Italy. Others had already left the country or had been imprisoned as military chaplains. Rome sent an urgent appeal to the White Fathers to dispatch there sixty missionaries to save the orphaned missions, and they did so. In 1945 Canadian Jesuits were entrusted with the organization of the educational system in Ethiopia.

---

[107] Ibid., 3. Juni 1978, 313.

[108] Statistics of April 1978 in ibid., 14. Juni 1978, 344. Further information on the situation of the Church in Angola and Mozambique in Herder-Korrespondenz 32 (Freiburg 1978), 302–9.

[109] AAS 67 (1975), 89f.

[110] Ibid. 174f.

[111] Ibid., 177.

[112] Motu proprio Sancta Dei Ecclesia of 25 March 1938 in AAS 30 (1938), 154–59; Sylloge, 567–73.

Catholic mission activity in Botswana, formerly Bechuanaland, is still young. The first mission station, still in existence, was founded in 1928. Since 1959 there has existed there the prefecture apostolic of Bechuanaland, which was entrusted to Irish Passionists. The diocese of Gaborone, founded in 1966, today includes all Botswana. The number of Catholics has grown in recent years from 10,000 to 26,390 in 1977. In Swaziland (Ngwane) Italian Servites do the missionary work. Bishop Casalini, O.S.M., of Manzini, the only diocese in the country, in 1976 placed his episcopal see at their disposal. Since then a native bishop has headed the diocese. In 1977 the number of Catholics amounted to 35,000 in a population of 520,000. At Manzini Salesians conduct a technical school, and Dominican Sisters a girls' high school.

The 25,000 Catholics in Liberia in 1977 are a "small flock," but their influence is incomparably greater. It is due to the educational and health systems of the Catholic Church. Here in the age of foundation not only did the climate occupy the Catholic missionaries, but also the intolerance and rejection on the part of the Protestant Christians. The Catholic Church did not really obtain civil rights until the 1930s. Today its schools surpass the other mission schools in number and quality, and, in contrast to these, are spread over the entire country. In the young Church of Senegal, where the philosopher, poet, and statesman Leopold Sédar Senghor (who attended the mission school of the Holy Ghost Fathers, in 1968 received the Peace Prize of the German Book Trade in the church of Saint Paul in Frankfurt, and since 1969 has been a member of the French Academy of Moral and Political Science as Adenauer's successor) rules the nation, the Church is not a stranger to questions of the young state. This is proved by the official positions of the bishops on social questions and the powerful effort of Christians for all questions of development aid. The chief problem remains the relationship to Islam. In Gabon the government of the young Church is entirely in native hands. Of course, the number of foreign missioners is still preponderant—in 1975 there were seventy of them, compared to thirty-four native priests. However, the number of native vocations is growing. As regards organization, the young Church consists of one archdiocese with three suffragans. It counts a total of 393,000 baptized in a population of 1.2 million.

Mali, a stronghold of socialism, assures religious freedom to the young Church of the state. In 1967, of the 4.75 million inhabitants about 39,000 were baptized Catholics and 170,000 catechumens. Today among 5.2 million inhabitants there are 47,000 Catholics, with one metropolitan see and five suffragans. In Upper Volta, with one metropolitan see, eight suffragans, and 336,000 Catholics in a population of 5.8 million, the Episcopal Conference in 1970 issued clear directions for the adaptation of the Catholic liturgy to African morals and customs and to African sensibilities. Gambia, the smallest African state, is a typical product of the colonial epoch and of colonial policy. The greatest problem of the young Church, which counts 11,500 faithful in one diocese among a half-million inhabitants, is the native clergy. Since March 1974 there is a common seminary for Liberia, Sierra Leone, and Gambia.

The Catholic Church in Chad is one of the youngest of the African Churches. It exists officially only since World War II, even if the neighboring mission in Cameroon had previously "encroached" on this territory. The chief problems of the Church—one metropolitan see, three suffragans, 211,000 faithful among 3.8 million inhabitants—are here, too, native vocations and relations with Islam. In the most recent past the signs of a starting Kulturkampf against the Christian Churches increased. The government wants to lead the nation back to "precolonial culture" and to "African authenticity."

In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the elevation of Biayenda to the College of Cardinals was unanimously welcomed and celebrated. Likewise, Catholics and non-Catholics were infuriated by his murder on the evening of 22 March 1977. A few days earlier, on 18 March, President Ngouabi had also been murdered.

At Abidjan, Ivory Coast, a theological faculty was opened in 1976, which had grown out of the Higher Institute for Religious Culture, founded in 1968. The chief concern of the new faculty is to give to the students a better understanding of African religious traditions. The bishops of English-speaking Africa are considering the founding of a similar faculty in Nigeria or Kenya. Also in Abidjan the Jesuits in 1962 founded an Institut Africain pour le Développement Économique et Social (INADES), with branch offices in other African countries, which gives courses at the institute and television courses, organizes courses in villages and cities, and has built up an imposing documentation and information service. In Benin there was a brief untoward incident. On 8 August 1977 the government forbade Bernardin Gantin, the former archbishop of Cotonou, who on 12 June of that year had been made a cardinal and was now visiting his homeland, all further journeys and any public appearance. This prohibition was issued after Gantin had celebrated a Mass in the church of Saint John at Cotonou for the victims of the shootings in Benin in January. Several government representatives, including the minister of the interior, had attended the Mass.

In Tanzania, where 20 percent of the population is Catholic and about 10 percent Anglican and Lutheran, there are today districts and tribes not yet touched by missionary preaching. Here the young Church of the nation still has a big task to implement.

Madagascar is a model example of a mission country in which the Church is growing quickly and steadily. At the beginning of the century it counted scarcely 120,000 faithful, in 1950 there were 700,000, and today they number 1.4 million in a total population of 7.9 million. However, the number of native priests was left behind, in comparison. In 1968 a National Catechists' Institute was established in Tananarive for the training of catechetical leaders. In the same year the bishops began a comprehensive pastoral planning. Cardinal Rakotomalala died unexpectedly on 1 November 1975. The population of the Comoro Islands voted in December 1974 whether to become independent or remain under French rule. The inhabitants of the island of Mayotte were for union with France. The other islands became independent. The population is almost exclusively Muslim. Of the 244,000 inhabitants, only 2,500 are Catholics, and of these almost 1,000 are Europeans. The pastoral work is entrusted to French Capuchins. The Seychelles, an archipelago of ninety-two islands, have been independent since 29 June 1976. Swiss Capuchins have worked there since 1921. On 25 July 1975 the native priest Felix Paul was ordained bishop. Of the 58,000 islanders, 53,000 are Catholics. Réunion continues to be a French possession. In 1975 Bishop Georges Guibert, of the Holy Ghost Fathers, resigned in order to make way for native personnel. On 2 May 1976 the native priest Gilbert Aubry became bishop of La Réunion or Saint-Denis.

In conclusion, let three important events for all the young Churches of Africa be mentioned: the canonization of the martyrs of Uganda in 1964, the message of Paul VI to Africa in 1967, and the Pope's journey to Uganda in 1969. On World Mission Sunday, 18 October 1964, Paul VI canonized the twenty-two martyrs of Uganda, who had been beatified on 6 June 1920 by Benedict XV. In the years 1885–87 they, together with another eighty Catholics, Anglicans, and Protestants, had been put to death in a persecution of Christians. They were thus the first Bantu in the calendar of saints of the Catholic Church. Many African bishops, priests, religious, and faithful came to Rome for the celebration. For the first time African choral singing and African drums were heard in Saint Peter's. In his homily the Pope spoke of the "present hour of decision for Africa." "The martyrs call for help" for the African Church, he continued. "Africa needs missionaries, especially priests, physicians, teachers, sisters, nurses, magnanimous persons to help the young and flourishing congregations, which still need much support, to grow in number and quality in order to become a people, the African People of the Church of God."[113]

In the message to Africa of 31 October 1967 Paul VI took up the present problems of the African peoples. He intended thereby to carry further the mission encyclical Fidei donum, in which Pius XII had already revealed his anxieties about the future of the African continent.[114] Here as there, the values of African culture were displayed. Paul VI stated sadly that not all missioners of past epochs had acknowledged these values. But he did not condemn the missionaries, because they were children of their age and were not immune to its prejudices. He called to mind what these missionaries in the past had done for the intellectual and material development of the African peoples. As the principal tasks of the present that would determine the future, the Pope indicated the struggle against illiteracy and the development of agriculture. He proposed the creation of a world fund for development aid, from which all needy states should be helped without secondary political aims. At the end the Pope invited the bishops of the whole world and all the faithful not to be remiss in help for the Churches of Africa. "In spite of some shadows, which We have indicated," he concluded, "We trust that Africa . . . , filled with reverence for the rights of God and the dignity of the person, will continue on the way of progress."[115]

The third event which we intend to mention here was the journey of Paul VI to Uganda from 31 July to 2 August 1969. It had been immediately preceded by another likewise epoch-making occurrence for the future of the African Churches—the first All-Africa Episcopal Symposium from 28 to 31 July at Gaba near Kampala.[116] Paul VI wanted to preside in person at the final session of the symposium. The second occasion of the journey was the dedication of the shrine of the martyrs at Namugongo. On these occasions too the Pope again spoke of his esteem for the African person, land, and culture. "We know no other desire," he said, "than precisely to accept and to foster what you are: namely, Christians and Africans. We want that Our presence here with you should be regarded as a recognition of your maturity, as Our desire and Our intention to prove to you that the communion which joins us together will in no way suppress but, on the contrary, will promote the original nature of the personality in private, ecclesiastical, and civic life." The Church, he said, has "been really planted in this blessed earth." Now, after this foundation has been laid, the Pope concluded, it is the function of the African Christians to reconstruct their Church on this continent themselves: "You Africans are now your own missionaries."[117]

---

[113] AAS 57 (1965), 693–703; Internationaler Fides-Dienst (1964), 549–55. On 22 June 1934 Pius XI declared Blessed Charles Lwanga patron of African youth. (AAS 26 [1934], 582f.).

[114] Of 21 April 1957 in AAS 49 (1957), 225–48.

[115] AAS 59 (1967), 1073–97. Internationaler Fides-Dienst (1976), 575–91.

[116] Cf. Herder-Korrespondenz 23 (Freiburg 1969), 421–26.

A proof that the young Churches of Africa wished to go their "African" way, and for years have done so ever more independently, is the almost 150 native religious communities of diocesan right, which were founded everywhere.[118] These and other fortunate initiatives justify the hope that the young Churches of Africa will successfully solve also the modern problems which they encounter. Among these problems are the explosionlike growth of the number of Catholics and the increase, not keeping pace with it, of native priestly vocations, the urbanization, the education of an elite, the nationalization of education. Especially the disproportionately rapid growth of the number of Catholics—anually ca. 6 percent—poses for the church leadership problems whose solution must immediately be tackled. First is the increase of priestly vocations. No less important are the religious instruction of children and adult education. Likewise in regard to material things there arise vital and urgent tasks, such as the increase of the number of churches.[119] Another danger threatens the Church from the sectarian system. On no other continent is Christianity so fragmented as in Africa. There are approximately 5,000 "Christian" splinter Churches and sects, with some 7 million adherents. Most of them have grown up on the soil of Protestantism. However, a few have come also from a Catholic background. The largest "Catholic" sect—the Maria-Legio Church—arose in 1963 among the Luo tribe on the east shore of Lake Victoria in Kenya.[120] It is consciously African, bound to African tradition, and in this consists its power of attraction.

As in Asia, the Episcopal Conferences of Africa and Madagascar also have merged in the Symposium des Conférences Épiscopales d'Afrique et de Madagascar (SCEAM) in order to solve in common their mutual problems.[121] In addition there are still the three regional groupings: Association des Conférences Épiscopales du Congo, de la République Centrafricaine, et du Tchad (ACECCT), the Conférence Épiscopale Régionale de l'Afrique de l'Ouest Francophone (CARAO), and the Association of Member Episcopal Conferences in Eastern Africa (AMECEA). From 24 to 30 July 1978 the symposium held its fifth plenary meeting at Nairobi[122] in the presence of Cardinal Opilio Rossi, president of the Papal Council for the Laity, of Archbishop Simon D. Lourdusamy, the secretary of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, of representatives of the European and South American Episcopal Conferences and of religious. The participants—nine cardinals and about sixty archbishops and bishops and delegates of the laity—represented the more than 50 million African Catholics. The chief topic of the symposium was "Christian Family Life in Africa Today." In his address, Lourdusamy stressed the necessity of an authentic and judicious inculturation of the Church.[123]

---

[117] AAS 61 (1969), 572–91 Internationaler Fides-Dienst (1969), 367–75.

[118] Cf. the "Supplementum" to the Bibliografia Missionaria, Anno XXXVIII, 1974, Quaderno no. 17 (Rome 1975), 23–49.

[119] Cf. Die katholischen Missionen (Freiburg 1971), 3.

[120] Cf. Die katholischen Missionen (Freiburg 1970), 12–15.

The Young Churches in Oceania

AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

The growth of the Catholic Church in Australia and New Zealand in the last century is amazing. The ecclesiastical organization was already essentially complete by 1920 and in the course of the past fifty years has undergone only slight changes. From 4 to 12 September 1937 the fourth Plenary Council of Australia and New Zealand met at Sydney under the chairmanship of the papal legate, Giovanni Panico.[124] The chief tasks of the council were the implementation of the new Codex iuris canonici and the consideration of more uniform pastoral and missionary methods.

Special attention was given to the evangelization of the primitive inhabitants of Australia. This task has belonged exclusively to the

---

[121] English Title: Symposium of Episcopal Conferences of Africa and Madagascar (SECAM).

[122] Originally the plenary meeting was to take place in Kinshasa. However, the domestic political disturbances that had broken out there caused the transfer toNairobi.

[123] "Inculturation, which is the consequence of the incarnational economy of salvation, is part and parcel of the mission of the Church and of the work of Evangelization it carries on. It is inseparable from the mission of the Church and indispensable for its evangelizing activity, simultaneous and all-dimensional with it." (International Fides Service, 23 August 1978, 378).

[124] The first plenary council was held in 1885, the second in 1895, the third in 1905. The fourth was supposed to be summoned in 1918 but rumors of an imminent ecumenical council in Rome and then the Twenty-Ninth World Eucharistic Congress at Sydney in 1928 delayed the implementation.

Australian Episcopal Conference since 22 March 1976, when Australia was removed from the jurisdiction of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples and transferred to the normal ecclesiastical administration. The Episcopal Conference is now competent for missionary work among the few remaining pagans in the (mixed and full-blooded) Australian aboriginal population of fifteen thousand. Hence a great responsibility was given to the young Church. Its function is so to integrate the aborigines that their traditions and culture may be taken into account. The community pastoral work must especially enter into and have regard for their needs. In a statement on the occasion of the "National Day of the Aborigines," the bishops took a position on all pastoral and ecclesiastical questions related to this problem and supported the demands of the aborigines on the state, the most important of which was the legal definition of the right to their possessions in northern Australia. In 1966 there were already sisters among the Australian aborigines, and in 1969 a convent of their own was erected for them at Darwin.

The Fortieth World Eucharistic Congress, which took place at Melbourne from 18 to 25 February 1973, for a brief time directed the interests of the Universal Church to the Church of Australia. The often bitter experiences which the Catholics especially had to endure in this originally overwhelmingly Anglican country now belong definitely to the past. The Catholic Church stands up together with the other Christian Churches for the rights of the underprivileged and hence has gained in esteem through this activity and this collaboration.[125] Of the 13.6 million inhabitants, 3.6 million, or 26.4 percent, are Catholics.

Also in New Zealand the ecclesiastical organization was complete by 1920. There were one archdiocese and three dioceses. The number of Catholics on 31 December 1976 amounted to 446,000, or 14.2 percent of the inhabitants. In the northern half of North Island the Mill Hill Missionaries take care of the evangelization of the Maori. The first priest of this tribe was ordained in 1945. The mission among the Maori even today still encounters difficulties. It is not easy to contact these people. In 1968 the first Maori sister made religious vows in Wanganui, a settlement of the Congregation of Sisters of Saint Joseph of Nazareth.

THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

In Oceania[126] the ecclesiastical organization of the incipient young Church from time to time had to adapt itself to the territorial, ethnic, and political circumstances. It was not always easy to keep sight of and follow events, especially when here too the independence movement of the island inhabitants and the transition from the colonial epoch to the present began. The mission Church on the Mariana Islands and the Carolines—to begin with these and continue our progress through the Pacific clockwise—had very much to suffer in the First as well as the Second World War. The entire vicariate once again remained for a rather long time without missionaries. After the war the islands became an American mandate. Rome united the Caroline and the Marshall Islands in a new vicariate apostolic and subordinated the Marianas to the vicariate apostolic of Guam, where Capuchins were active. In 1965 the vicariate became the Diocese of Agana as a suffragan see of San Francisco. The islanders are almost all Catholics.

---

[125] Cf. Herder-Korrespondenz 27 (Freiburg 1973), 196–202.

[126] Cf. the article by A. Freitag, S.V.D., in ZMR 36 (Münster 1952), 144–52, 214–22; 37 (1953), 283–93; 38 (1954), 121–31.

The Sandwich Islands, usually called Hawaii after the largest island, experienced, from the time they belonged to the United States in 1898, a missionary upsurge in so far as now American missionaries and especially missionary sisters came to the aid of the Picpus Fathers. From 1926 to 1940 Bishop Estevão Alencastre, S.S.C.C., directed the vicariate. Under him the mission made such progress that on 25 January 1941 Rome elevated the vicariate to a diocese as suffragan of San Francisco. On the Marquesas, where the Picpus Fathers had great freedom of movement from 1924 on, the mission saved the population from dying out. The islanders had declined to 2,500 persons and threatened to become entirely extinct. The missionaries did all they could to improve the people's hygiene. Since then the number of inhabitants is again on the rise. In 1943 there were 3,200 islanders, in 1973 5,600. They are almost all Catholics. Also on the Society Islands (Tahiti), the Gambier Islands, the Tuamotu Islands, and the Leeward Islands the colonial government long impeded Catholic missionary activity. A further obstacle to successful evangelization was the rivalry of the Protestant denominations, which had often preceded the Catholic mission. The Catholic missionaries realized greater successes on the Society Islands, whose population today is one-third Catholic. Since 1947 Chinese immigrants have also been included in the mission. From time immemorial the missionaries have championed the improvement of popular hygiene in order to prevent the extinction of the islanders, as well as the educational system and other works of intellectual and material development aid.

On the Cook and Manahiki Islands the Catholic mission did not flourish until very late. In 1926 there were among the 9,500 islanders only 450 Catholics, as compared with 6,330 Protestants. In 1949 there were 1,410 Catholics and 13,000 Protestants, but in 1972 there were 3,056 Catholics in a population of 26,217. On Wallis and Futuna, the Tonga archipelago, and the Niue Islands of central Oceania the Marists of Father Colin have done mission work since 1836. Their activity included also every sort of development aid for the native islanders. The enormous distances required a large number of mission personnel The cooperation of native catechists and missionaries was therefore essential. In 1950 there were already in this vicariate 24 native priests, 32 native brothers, and 227 native sisters. There had been a major seminary on Wallis since 1874. The first four native priests had been ordained in 1886. In 1935 Rome detached the islands of Wallis, Futuna, and Alofi and there erected a new vicariate. In 1950 the 9,000 islanders were all Catholics. The rest of the vicariate was named in 1937 after the Tonga Islands and in 1957 after these and Niue Island. Here the Catholic mission always had a difficult time in relation to the Protestant, which had embraced all the islanders as early as 1875. Today about one-fifth of the people are Catholics.

The Navigator Islands or Samoa were likewise entrusted to the Marists for evangelization. Here too all the islanders were converted to Christianity. In 1948 there were 20,000 and in 1973 36,798 Catholics in a total population of 174,866. Here too the Marists began early to train a native mission personnel. To Samoa belongs the honor of having obtained the first native bishop of Oceania. On 11 January 1968 Paul VI appointed the Marist Father Pius Taofinu'u as bishop of the diocese of Apia and Western Samoa, created just eighteen months previously.[127] An even greater significance belonged to the naming of the first Polynesian bishop in that on 1 January 1962 Western Samoa had acquired its political independence as the first island nation of Oceania. In the consistory of 5 March 1973 Paul VI created the first bishop in Oceania the first cardinal in Oceania. The Fiji Islands had been a British colony since 1874 and obtained their independence on 10 October 1970. Only in the 1920s could the Marists here think of training Polynesian priests. In 1923 they established a minor seminary at Cawaci. Only four of the first seminarians reached the goal, but a beginning had been made. From the catechists' school, founded earlier, there emerged in 1924–34 ninety qualified catechists and teachers.

In the vicariate apostolic of New Caledonia the formation of a native mission personnel was also not taken up systematically until recent times. The first two native priests were ordained in 1946. In 1950 there were also nineteen native brothers and eighty-eight native sisters. Thereby the preconditions for an autonomous Church was created here also. New tasks came to the mission because of the immigration of [127] He was born on 9 December 1923 at Falealupo on Savaii, had been ordained a priest in 1954, had entered the Marist Congregation in 1962, and on 29 May 1968 received episcopal ordination.

---

Tonkinese and Javanese. Today, out of 135,000 inhabitants, 88,000, or 65.2 percent, are Catholics. The rest are Protestants and Muslims and a small remnant of pagans. The Marist mission on the New Hebrides was long regarded as a "hard quarry," not least because of the deadly climate. As regards numbers, the Catholic mission was unable to make great progress. In 1948, of the 60,000 islanders only forty-eight hundred were Catholics. But since then the number has increased quickly to 16,000 in 1976, out of 97,000 inhabitants. At this time the education of native priests was taken up, while there were native catechists and teachers even before World War II.

The most difficult mission of the Marists in Oceania was the Solomon Islands. When at last the preconditions for the construction of a native Church had been created and the formation of the native mission personnel began to produce the first successes, World War II caused the mission the greatest harm. The Japanese occupied more than half the islands. Most of the missioners were taken to Australia. Two priests and two sisters of the South Solomons and thirteen priests, brothers, and sisters of the North Solomons met death. Immediately after the war the Marists began to rebuild and quickly led the mission to a new flowering. At the end of 1976, of the 200,000 islanders, 37,000, or 18.5 percent, were Catholics. On 7 July 1978 the island chain achieved political independence.

In the vicariate apostolic of the Gilbert Islands, to which belonged also the Ellice and Phoenix Islands, the Sporádhes, Nauru (since 1923), and other islands, the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart did the mission work. The number of faithful rose from 13,500 in 1922 to 25,500 in 1972, that is, about 50 percent of the population. World War II brought unspeakable suffering throughout the entire mission area. Personal and material damages were very great. The Missionaries of the Sacred Heart also evangelized the vicariate apostolic of Rabaul, Papua-New Guinea. In World War II fifty-seven priests and brothers and ten native sisters lost their lives there, twenty-three by violence. One-third of the native population was deported or killed. The number of Catholics—in 1939 there were 45,000—dropped to ca. 8,000. The mission lost all material institutions and property. But after the war reconstruction got under way at once. American, Australian, and Irish Missionaries of the Sacred Heart came to help. The Australian government granted considerable support. The statistics of 1973 report 118,000 Catholics in a population of 170,000.

On British New Guinea, where, in addition to the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart, the Society of the Divine Word, Franciscans, Capuchins, Montfortians, Passionists, and a large number of communities of sisters are active, World War II wiped out a mission work that had just flowered. The vicariates of eastern and central New Guinea especially had to suffer much. Many missionaries lost their lives, the rest were deported to Australia. After the war, everything had to start again from scratch.

Altogether 118 priests and brothers and seventy-eight sisters lost their lives in Oceania and New Guinea during World War II, while others became unfit for work. Twelve hundred mission buildings were totally destroyed, 120 partly.[128] After overcoming the war's damages, Catholic mission activity and development aid in all Oceania revived to a new flowering. Rome considered raising the furthest advanced vicariates to dioceses. But this idea was again dropped, because a still more comprehensive plan was taken under consideration: the erection of a regular ecclesiastical hierarchy and, with that, the canonical setting up of the young Churches. During the Second Vatican Council Rome was unable to have direct contact with the ordinaries of Oceania in regard to this question. The discussions came to a decision during the last period of the council. On 21 June 1966 the hierarchy was erected in Polynesia, Micronesia, and Melanesia. Three ecclesiastical provinces were formed: (1) Nouméa (New Caledonia), with the dioceses of Port Vila (New Hebrides) and Wallis-Futuna; (2) Suva (Fiji Islands), with Apia (Western Samoa) and Tarawa (Gilbert Islands); (3) Papeete (Tahiti), with Taiohae (Marquesas). Further, the dioceses of Rarotonga (Cook Islands) and Tonga were established; the former was assigned as suffragan to Wellington, the latter was immediately subject to the Holy See. The arrangement of the ecclesiastical provinces had its difficulties in consequence of the fluctuating political situation. There were independent islands such as the Kingdom of Tonga and the Principality of Western Samoa; other islands were under mandate status or under condominium, still others were under colonial rule. And ethnic viewpoints could not be used as a basis. Thus Rome turned, to some extent, to the still existing zones of influence of England, France, the United States, and New Zealand. Out of regard for the national pride of the population of Tonga, this island became a diocese placed directly under the Holy See.[129]

The ordinaries of Papua-New Guinea and the British Protectorate of the Solomon Islands also requested during the last period of the council the erection of an ecclesiastical hierarchy in their mission territory. They indicated the movements for political independence and the intention of the Anglican Church to reorganize itself there. Although the mission Church there was still relatively young, it was regarded as sufficiently consolidated to introduce a general ecclesiastical organization. In this way the foreign and native mission societies should be compensated for their devoted activity, a new impetus would be given to the mission Church, and here also the organization of the Church in vicariates and prefectures, often regarded as a relic of the colonial epoch, would be eliminated. Hence on 15 November 1966 three new ecclesiastical provinces were erected: (1) Port Moresby, with the suffragan sees of Bereina (Yule Island), Daru, Mendi, and Sideia; (2) Madang, with Aitape, Goroka, Lae, Mount Hagen, Vanimo, and Wewak; (3) Rabaul, with Bougainville (North Solomons), Honiara (South Solomons), Kavieng, and Gizo (Western Solomons).[130] The first Papuan bishop, Ludwig Vangeke, M.S.C., who had been the first Papuan to be ordained a priest, was ordained by Paul VI at Sydney on 3 December 1970. On 16 September 1976 Papua-New Guinea received its political independence. On 7 March 1977 a nunciature was established there.[131]

---

[128] Cf. P. O'Reilly in NZM 3 (Schöneck 1947), 106f.

[129] AAS 59 (1967), 201–3.

Among the greatest cares of most of the new residential bishops is the education of a native clergy. According to a report of 6 February 1970[132] there was at the time not a single native priest in some dioceses, such as Taiohae and Rarotonga. In the other dioceses the native clergy was, compared with the foreign, a minority, except on Wallis and Futuna, where thirteen native and six foreign priests were active. On 2 March 1972, therefore, Wallis and Futuna obtained a native auxiliary bishop. Tonga also had a rather large number of native priests—nine, as compared with twelve foreign—and so there too a native coadjutor bishop was appointed on 15 October 1971. Altogether, according to the report just mentioned, of 309 diocesan and religious priests in this area, eighty-six were natives. There were three seminaries: one major seminary in Nouméa and two minor seminaries in Paita in the archdiocese of Nouméa and Lano in the diocese of Wallis-Futuna. There were many native vocations to the sisterhoods. There were 229 native sisters as opposed to 653 foreign. Several native congregations of sisters were established. Altogether, today there are nine native congregations of sisters in this area and four congregations of brothers of diocesan right.[133]

A new ecclesiastical problem resulted on the Fiji Islands because of the immigration of ca. 30,000 Indians. The archbishop of Suva exerted himself to obtain Indian priests for them. The emigrant Indians abroad lost their contact with Hinduism and hence were more easily accessible to the Christian message.

---

[130] Ibid., 480–82.

[131] Ibid. 69 (1977), 256. For the Solomon Islands the apostolic delegation still exists (ibid., 256f.).

[132] Cf. Memoria Rerum III/2, 552.

[133] Cf. the "Supplementum" of the Bibliografia Missionaria, Anno XXXIX–1975, Quaderno no. 18 (Rome 1976), 55–58.

In 1968 the bishops of Oceania joined together as the Episcopal Conference of the Pacific (CEPAC). In March 1968 they had their first plenary meeting.

THE PHILIPPINES

The "young" Church on the Philippines is no more a young Church than those in the United States or Canada. But it has not a few problems in common with the mission Churches, and, above all, it lies in the Third World. As a Spanish patronate Church it had from the start a regular ecclesiastical hierarchy. The four vicariates apostolic were only erected in the 1930s and 1950s respectively, were subject to the Roman missionary authorities, but belonged to one of the thirteen ecclesiastical provinces with the same number of archdioceses and a total of thirty-one dioceses and twelve prelacies. With 80 percent Catholics out of 42 million inhabitants, the Philippines are a Catholic country, the only one in Southeast Asia. Only on the southern islands do some 3 million Muslims live, who feel themselves to be an oppressed minority.

The most recent past repeatedly produced, especially in the 1970s, tensions between Church and state and within the Church. Ecclesiastical circles reacted differently to the imposition of martial law by the president of the Philippines. In a common pastoral statement the Episcopal Conference first declared that it recognized the right and duty of the civil authorities to take proper steps to protect the sovereignty of the state and to guarantee the peace and well-being of the nation, but then the bishops appealed to the leaders and to every individual of the people to make a serious examination of conscience. However, in the last analysis the seventy-five bishops were not united in their attitude to the government.[134] Subsequently the government repeatedly tried to put pressure on the Church.

The episcopate sees a special task in the fostering of a Filipino clergy. Lack of priests long was and still is a central problem of the Church of the Philippines, and therefore the mission work in the vicariates apostolic is to a great extent in the hands of foreign personnel. Nevertheless in the last twenty years a rapid increase of native priestly vocations could be recorded. Thus, for example, the number of diocesan priests grew between 1956 and 1966 from 1,430 to 2,503 and that of religious priests from 147 to 394. A new great and responsible function devolves on the clergy and hence on the entire Philippine Church today: the evangelization of Southeast Asia, to which it is racially and culturally closer than are the Western Churches. Besides, Filipino missioners are not exposed to the suspicion that they are emissaries of Western "imperialism." The missionary spread has already begun. The Society of the Divine Word missionaries have employed several of their Filipino priests in Indonesia, and the Sisters of the Society of the Divine Word were the first congregation of women to send Filipino sisters to the mission in New Guinea. Since 1967 Filipino Oblates have been active in Hong Kong.

---

[134] Cf. Herder-Korrespondenz 28 (Freiburg 1974), 121–23; 29 (1975), 100.

In the last few years the Church saw itself repeatedly induced to defend human rights. On 8 January 1967 the bishops published a "Pastoral Letter on Social Work and Agricultural Development," by which they aspired to give the government hints for eliminating existing abuses. In January 1977 they wrote a courageous pastoral on the problems and difficulties existing between state and Church.

The church was also drawn into the armed confrontation between the Muslims and the state. In 1974, on the occasion of a raid by Muslim rebels on the islands of Jolo, almost the entire capital was destroyed and the Catholic cathedral was burned down. Nevertheless the approximately 7,000 Christians of the island did not regard the Muslims as their enemies. The hundred-year old Catholic church on the Sulu Archipelago has in recent years made great efforts to establish peace and reconciliation. About 98 percent of the Sulu Archipelago is Islamic.[135]

The above-mentioned responsibility of the Philippine Church for the evangelization of the peoples of Southeast Asia is seen also in the establishment of the radio station Radio Veritas at Manila, which began operation on 11 April 1969 and beams broadcasts in twenty languages to the areas of Oceania and Southeast Asia. The decision to establish this radio station was made at the Conference of the Bishops of Southeast Asia in Manila in 1958. The Roman Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, the assistance work of the German Catholic Church's Misereor and Missio, and the German Federal Republic bore the heavy burden of the financial expenses.[136] Since 1975 the radio has been subject to the Philippine Episcopal Conference.

Paul VI's journey to the Far East from 26 November to 5 December 1970 was a religious happening for the young Churches in Oceania, Australia, and all other countries which the Pope touched upon in the journey. At Manila Paul VI took part in the closing sessions of the Symposium of the Asiatic Episcopal Conferences, whose chief topics were the Church's aid for development and the pastoral care of university students. Referring to the meager successes which the proclamation of the Christian faith had achieved thus far in Asia, apart from the Philippines, the Pope said to the bishops: "If in the past an inadequate knowledge of the riches which are concealed in the various cultures has been able to prevent the spread of the Gospel, and a false picture of the Church resulted, it is up to you to explain that the salvation brought by Jesus Christ is offered to all peoples, and without distinction of conditions of life, without attachment to a privileged race, a continent, or a culture, and that the Gospel, far from wishing to eliminate 'the germs of the good in the hearts and in the ideologies of people or in their own rites and their culture,' has the effect of refining all these values, elevating them, and perfecting them to the honor of God (Lumen Gentium, 17; Ad Gentes, 22). Following the model of Jesus Christ, who shared the living conditions of his environment, the Asian can be Catholic and remain fully Asian. If we declared in Africa a year ago that the Church must above all be Catholic, then a pluralism is still justified and even desirable, namely in the manner of expressing one common faith in the same Lord Jesus Christ."[137]

---

[135] Cf. Die katholischen Missionen (Freiburg 1976), 197–201; (1978), 51–55; Herder-Korrespondenz 31 (Freiburg 1977), 60–63.

[136] Internationaler Fides-Dienst 1969, 214f., 232–34.

From Manila the Pope went on 29 November to Samoa. There he sent an urgent appeal to the Catholics of the entire world, the purpose of which was the renewal of the mission spirit.[138] The next stop on the journey was at Sydney, where seventy-two bishops of Australia, New Zealand, and Oceania had gathered for a symposium, at which were discussed timely problems of the Church in this area: proclamation of the faith, development aid, youth, the priesthood, ecumenism. The Pope took part in the closing session. As the theme of his talk he selected the unity of the Church. This may have been done in relation to the special ecumenical circumstances in Oceania, where the vast distances, the lack in shepherds of souls, and the related absence, often weeks or months long, of the priest have led to special arrangements with other Christian Churches. In general the Catholic mission Churches in Australia and Oceania are very receptive to ecumenism. By way of Jakarta, Hong Kong, and Colombo, Paul VI returned to Rome from his journey to the Far East.[139]

---

[137] AAS 63 (1971), 25–26.

[138] Ibid., 47–50.

[139] The Pope's addresses during the journey in AAS 63 (1971), 10–83.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

BIBLIOGRAPHY TO INDIVIDUAL CHAPTERS

SECTION ONE

The Institutional Unity of the Universal Church

1. Statistics

STATISTICS OF THE WORLD'S POPULATION—STATISTICS OF THE WORLD RELIGIONS—PROPORTION OF CATHOLICS

SOURCES: Pertinent sources for statistics of world population in Population Index (Office of Population Research, University of Princeton, N.Y.); Population Studies (London School of Economics, Houghton Street, Aldwych, London, W.C. 2); and Population (27, rue du Commandeur, Paris 14e). For information on individual countries there are monographs called Country Profiles (Population Council, 245 Park Avenue, New York). Comprehensive source in the Demographic Yearbook of the United Nations (Statistical Office of the United Nations, New York), 1948ff., and the survey A Concise Summary of the World Population Situation in 1970 (United Nations, N.Y. 1971), also the UN Statistical Yearbook (New York), 1948ff.

Statistics of World Religions: Demographic Yearbook of the United Nations; World Christian Handbook, ed. by E. J. Bingle et al., London, from 1949 at yearly intervals; Kirchliches Handbuch für das Katholische Deutschland (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1970ff.); Atlas Hierarchicus. Descriptio geographica et statistica ecclesiae catholicae tum occidentis tum orientis, ed. by H. Emmerich, S.V.D., (Mödling, Austria 1968) (Supplement: Eine geschichtliche Einführung und Erläuterungen zu den Karten) (1913), 2d ed. (1929) by Karl Streit S.V.D., Mödling, Austria; Atlas zur Kirchengeschichte. Die christlichen Kirchen in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. by H. Jedin, K. S. Latourette, and J. Martin (Freiburg 1970). —For Mission lands: Internationaler Fides-Dienst (Catholic) (Rome 1962); Oriente Cattolico (Oriental Christians) (Rome 1962); K. B. Westman and H. v. Sicard, Geschichte der christlichen Mission (Protestant) (Munich 1962); Jewish Statistical Bureau (Jerusalem 1959).—World Confessional map. LThk 6 (1961).

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE ENTIRE CHURCH FROM 1914 TO 1970

SOURCES: Acta Apostolicae Sedis (AAS) (Vatican City 1909ff.); Annuario Pontificio (Vatican City 1912ff.); Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1907ff.); L'attività della Santa Sede (Rome 1938–39ff.); Annuario Statistico della Chiesa (Rome 1971ff.).

LITERATURE: The Roman Curia: J. Ferrante, Summa Juris Constitutionalis Ecclesiae (Rome 1964); N. Del Re, La Curia Romana. Lineamenti storico-giuridici (Rome 1970);

LThK 6 (Freiburg 1961) cols. 692–94; L. Pasztor, La Curia Romana. Problemi e ricerche per la sua storia nell'età moderna e contemporanea (Rome 1971).—College of Cardinals: H. W. Klewitz, Die Entstehung des Kardinalskollegiums. Reformpapsttum und Kardinalskollegium (Darmstadt 1957); LThK 5 (Freiburg 1960) cols. 1342–44; P. C. van Lierde and A. Giraud, Das Kardinalskollegium (Der Christ in der Welt 12) (Aschaffenburg 1965). —Curial Congregations: F. M. Cappello, De Curia Romana, 2 vols. (Rome 1911–13); V. Martin, Les Congrégations romaines (Paris 1930); A large number of monographs, for the most part doctoral dissertations for the individual congregations; LThK 5 (Freiburg 1960) cols. 1344–49. —Papal Diplomacy: U. Stutz, Die päpstliche Diplomatie unter Leo XIII. nach den Denkwürdigkeiten des Kardinals Domenico Ferrara, Abh. der Preuß. Akademie der Wissenschaften, Phil.-Hist. KL. 1925, no. 3/4, Berlin 1926; G. de Marchi, Le nunziature Apostoliche dal 1800 al 1957 (Rome 1959); with a list of secretaries of state and nuncios from 1800 to 1956). —G. Ferroglio, Circoscrizioni ed enti territoriali della Chiesa (Turin 1946); P. Negwer, Die kuriale Zirkumskriptionspraxis in ihrer Bedeutung für den gegenwärtigen Rechtsstatus der ostdeutschen Diözesen (diss., Basel 1963). In addition: See handbooks and commentaries on Canon law as well has histories of the Church and the papacy.

2. Popes Benedict XV, Pius XI, and Pius XII— Biography and Activity within the Church

GENERAL: Official acts in the AAS; a continuing report in the AKR by N. Hilling; J. Schmidlin, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit III (Munich 1936), 179–339 (Benedict XV); IV (Munich 1939) (Pius XI); H. Hermelink, Die katholische Kirche unter den Piuspäpsten des 20 Jahrhunderts (Zollikon and Zurich 1949); G. Schwaiger, Geschichte der Päpste im 20. Jahrhundert (Munich 1968); C. Falconi, I papi del ventesimo secolo (Milan 1967); F. Sugrue, Popes in the Modern World (New York 1961); A. Oddone, "Azione pacificatrice e caritatevole del Papato contemporaneo," CivCatt 101 (1950), 68–82.

BENEDICT XV

The BIOGRAPHIES published during the lifetime of Benedict XV offer biographical material but no real evaluation: A. De Waal, Der neue Papst (Hamm 1915); A. Pöllmann, Benedikt XV aus der Familie Della Chiesa (Dießen 1915); A. Baudrillart, Benoît XV (Paris 1920); more information are the obituaries by H. Sierp, in: StdZ 102 (1922), 401–8; Funk, in: Hochland 19 (1921/22), 651–59.—Later Biographies: F. Vistalli (Hildesheim 1932); F. Pichon (Paris 1940); F. Hayward, Un pape méconnu: Benoît XV (Tournai and Paris 1955); W. H. Peters, The Life of Benedict XV (Milwaukee 1959).—Historical perspectives in F. Ehrle, "Von Pius X. zu Benedikt XV," StdZ 88 (1915), 201–19; S. Merkle, "Benedikt XIV—Benedikt XV," Hochland 12 (1914/15), 340–47. —New Letters: F. Molinari, "Il carteggio di Benedetto XV con Mons. Ersilio Monzani," RSTI 20 (1966), 410–50.

INTERNAL ECCLESIASTICAL ACTIVITIES: N. Hilling, "Die gesetzgeberische Tätigkeit Benedikts XV. bis zur Promulgation des Codex iuris canonici," AKR 98 (1918), 223–39, 378–406, 561–74; For the years after 1917, ibid. 103 (1923), 5–36; J. Kleijntjens, "Activité charitable de Benoît XV," RHE 43 (1948), 536–45; R. Leiter, "Die päpstliche Kriegsfürsorge," StdZ 100 (1921), 197–208.

PIUS XI

To the BIOGRAPHIES published during his pontificate, the same comment applies as to those of Benedict XV: M. Bierbaum (Cologne 1922); A. Novelli (Milan 1923); U. Togani, Pio XI. La vita e le opere (Milan 1937); G. Galbiati (Cologne 1937); L. Townsend (London 1930); B. Williamson (London 1931); P. Hughes (London 1937). —Obituaries: StdZ 136 (1939), 1–9; A. Novelli in La Scuola cattolica 67 (1939), 624ff.; G. Galbiati, Papa Pio XI (Milan 1939). —Important for an understanding of his personality are the memoirs of two of his collaborators: C. Confalonieri, Pio XI visto da vicino (Turin 1937); E. Pellegrinetti, Pio XI. L'uomo nel Papa e il Papa nell'uomo (Rome 1940). —A comprehensive description of the personality and the work of Pius XI in the collection by the archbishopric of Milan: Pio XI nel trentesimo della morte 1939/69 (Milan 1969); pages 5–58 list a detailed bibliography prepared by A. Rimoldi.

SPECIAL STUDIES: G. Galbiati, "La produzione scientifica di Achille Ratti," Aevum 13 (1940), bibliographical supplement 301–12; N. Malvezzi, Pio XI nei suoi scritti (Milan 1923); A. Ratti, Scritti storici (Florence 1932); G. Bobba and F. Mauro, Achille Ratti. Alpine Schriften (Regensburg 1936); F. Kraft, "Papst Pius XI. als Bibliothekar," Festschrift Eugen Stollreither (Erlangen 1950), 105–16; concerning his private correspondence, see N. Vian in Mélange E. Tisserant VIII (Rome 1954), 373–439; D. Bertetto, ed., Discorsi di Pio XI, 3 vols. (Turin 1959–61).

PIUS XII

BIBLIOGRAPHIES: A. Rimoldi in La Scuola Cattolica 77 (1949), 88–108; B. Schneider in AHP. —Until 1939: Reliable information on family and development in H. Hoberg, Papst Pius XII. (Lucerne 1949); concerning his brother, consult B. Schneider, "Das Tagebuch des Francesco Pacelli," StdZ 164 (1958/59), 81–97; Y. de la Brière, "Pie XII avant son Pontificat," Études 239 (1939), 87–101; L. Kaas, ed., Eugenio Pacelli, Erster Apostolischer Nuntius beim Deutschen Reich. Gesammelte Reden (Berlin 1930); Eugenio Pacelli, Discorsi e Panegirici 1931–1938 (Vatican City 1939); B. Wüstenberg and I. Zabkar, eds., Pius XII. Der Papst an die Deutschen (Frankfurt 1965), contains the Pope's speeches and open letters in German from 1917 to 1956.

During the Pontificate: In addition to the documentation contained in Hoberg until 1948, see M. Bierbaum (Cologne 1939); O. Walter (Olten 1939); F. Loidl (Vienna 1947); P. Dahm (Mönchen-Gladbach 1952); Konstantin Prinz von Bayern (Bad Wörishofen 1952); W. Sandfuchs (Karlsruhe 1956); A. M. Rathgeber (Kempten 1958); I. O. Smit, Pastor angelicus (Roermond 1949); G. Goyau (Paris 1939); P. Lesourd (Paris 1940); E. Buonaiuti (Rome 1946); W. Padellaro (Rome 1949); L. Veneziani (Pisa 1942); C. H. Doyle (New York 1945); O. Halecki (London 1954); R. C. Pollock, The Mind of Pius XII (London 1955).

Obituaries and Biographies since 1958: R. Leiber in StdZ 163 (1958/59), 81–100; A. Martini in CivCatt 109, 4 (1958), 233–46; G. Crosignani, "Aspetti della personalità e dell'opera di Pio XII," Divus Thomas 62 (1959), 3–33; I. Coppens, "Pie XII. In memoriam," EThL 34 (1958), 873–83; D. Tardini, Pio XII (Vatican City 1960), the most revealing biography by his closest collaborator; I. Giordani, Pio XII, Un grande papa (Turin 1961); G. Andreotti, Pio XII (Rome 1965); F. Engel-Janosi, "Der Stellvertreter Christi Pius XII. Aspekte seiner Gestalt," Wort und Wahrheit 23 (1968), 546–59; B. Schneider, Pius XII. (Göttingen 1968); K. N. Burton, Witness of the Light. The Life of Pope Pius XII (New York 1958); L. Chaigne, Portrait et vie de Pie XII (Paris 1966).

THE WORK OF THE POPE: Compilation of the most important decrees and decisions in AKR 122 (1947) and 128 (1958). Discorsi e radiomessaggi di S. Stà Pio XII, 20 vols. (Vatican City 1941–59); Discorsi agli intellettuali 1939–1954 (Vatican City 1955); L'attività della Santa Sede, in annual volumes since 1945, unofficial. For the publications of documents from the Vatican Archives, see Chap. 3. —"Papst Pius XII. 1939–1958. Eine Dokumentation seines Pontifikats," HK 13 (1958/59), 57–71; "Pius XII im Urteil der nichtkatholischen Welt," HK 13 (1958/59), 233–46; La vie d'Église sous Pie XII (Paris 1959); G. B. Montini, "Pio XII e l'ordine internazionale," La Scuola Cattolica 85 (1957), 3–24; R. Losada-Cosmes, "Magisterio de Pio XII. Esquema doctrinal y boletín bibliográfico," Salmanticensis 3 (1956), 509–687; S. Mayer, "Die Bedeutung Papst Pius' XII. für das Recht, besonders das Kirchenrecht," AKR 130 (1961), 436–71; S. Álvarez Menéndez, "Pio XII Canonista," Revista española de derecho can. 13 (1958), 721–35; G. Falconi, Il Pentagono Vaticano (Bari 1958); I. Giordani, Vita contro morte. La Santa Sede per le vittime della seconda guerra mondiale (Milan 1956); several contributions with illustrations in Osservatore della Domenica, 28 June 1964; A. J. Muench, "Bilanz einer Nuntiatur 1946–1959. Schlußbericht des ersten Nuntius in der Nachkriegszeit," ed. by L. Volk in StdZ 195 (1977), 147–58.

3. Foreign Policy of the Popes in the Epoch of the World Wars

SOURCES

GENERAL: AAS 6 (1914)–38 (1946); L'Osservatore Romano; L'attività della Santa Sede nel 1939. Pubblicazione non uffiziale (annually from 1939); E. Marmy, ed., Mensch und Gemeinschaft in christlicher Schau. Dokumente (from 1832 to 1944) (Fribourg 1945).

REFERENCES: G. de Marchi, Le Nunziature Apostoliche dal 1800 al 1956 (Rome 1957); L. Schöppe, ed., Konkordate seit 1800. Originaltext und deutsche Übersetzung der geltenden Konkordate (Berlin 1964).

MEMOIRS: G. Spadolini, ed., Il cardinale Gasparri e la Questione Romana, con brani delle memorie inedite (Florence 1972); L. von Pastor, Tagebücher, Briefe, Erinnerungen, ed. by W. Wühr (Heidelberg 1950); Beyens, Baron, Quatre ans à Rome 1921–1926. Fin du pontificat de Benoît XV, Pie XI, les débuts du fascisme (Paris 1934); F. Charles-Roux, Huit ans au Vatican 1932–1940 (Paris 1947); E. von Weizsäcker, Erinnerungen (Munich 1950); L. E. Hill, ed., Die Weizsäcker-Papiere (Frankfurt 1974).

DOCUMENTS: T. E. Hachey, ed., Anglo-Vatican Relations, 1914–1939: Confidential Annual Reports of the British Ministers to the Holy See (Boston 1972); F. Engel-Janosi, Vom Chaos zur Katastrophe. Vatikanische Gespräche 1918 bis 1938, vornehmlich auf Grund der Berichte der österreichischen Gesandten beim Heiligen Stuhl (Vienna 1971); W. Steglich, ed., Der Friedensappell Papst Benedikts XV. vom 1. August 1917 und die Mittelmächte. Diplomatische Aktenstücke . . . aus den Jahren 1915–1922 (Wiesbaden 1970); W. Steglich, ed., Die Verhandlungen des 2. Unterausschusses des parlamentarischen Untersuchungsausschusses über die päpstliche Friedensaktion von 1917. Aufzeichnungen und Vernehmungsprotokolle (Wiesbaden 1974); A. Struker, ed., Die Kundgebungen Benedikts XV. zum Weltfrieden. Urtext und Übertragung (Freiburg 1917); P. Scoppola, La Chiesa e il fascismo, Documenti e interpretazioni (Bari 1971), best introduction; C. A. Biggini, Storia inedita della Conciliazione (Milan 1942); F. Pacelli, Diario della Conciliazione, M. Maccarone, ed. (Vatican City 1959); F. Margiotta Broglio, Italia e Santa Sede dalla grande guerra alla conciliazione. Aspetti politici e giuridici (Bari 1966); F. Fonzi, "Documenti per la storia dei Patti Lateranesi. Due relazione di Domenico Barone," RSCI 19 (1965), 403–35; A. de Gasperi, Lettere sul Concordato, con saggi di M.R. de Gasperi e di G. Martina (Brescia 1970); L. Volk, ed., Kirchliche Akten über die Reichskonkordatsverhandlungen 1933 (Mainz 1969); A. Kupper, ed., Staatliche Akten über die Reichskonkordatsverhandlungen 1933 (Mainz 1969); D. Albrecht, ed., Der Notenwechsel zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und der Deutschen Reichsregierung I: Von der Ratifizierung des Reichskonkordats bis zur Enzyklika "Mit brennender Sorge" (Mainz 1965); II: 1937–1945 (Mainz 1969); H. Hürten, ed., Deutsche Briefe 1934–1938. Ein Blatt der katholischen Emigration I: 1934–1935, II: 1936–1938 (Mainz 1969); Pio XII, Discorsi e Radiomessaggi di Sua Santità I (1940)–VIII (1946) [according to the years of his pontificate, beginning 2 March]; A. F. Utz and J. F. Groner, Aufbau und Entfaltung des gesellschaftlichen Lebens. Soziale Summe Pius' XII., 2 vols. (Fribourg 1954); P. Blet, R. A. Graham [beginning with Vol. 3], A. Martini, B. Schneider, eds., Actes et documents du Saint Siège relatifs à la seconde guerre mondiale (Vatican City 1965ff.) [Contains reports on peace and war and the ecclesiastical situation in Germany, Poland, and the Baltic states]; Le Saint Siege et la guerre en Europe: Mars 1939–août 1940 (=ADSS 1 [1965]); Juin 1940–juin 1941 (=ADSS 4 [1967]); Juillet 1941–octobre 1942 (=ADSS 5 [1969]); Novembre 1942–décembre 1943 (=ADSS 7 [1973]); the documents for 1944/45 were published in 1978; Lettres de Pie XII aux Évêques allemands 1939–1944 (=ADSS 2 [1966]), reissued with minor corrections by B. Schneider, P. Blet and A. Martini, eds., Die Briefe Pius' XII. an die deutschen Bischöfe 1939–1944 (Mainz 1966), cited as: B. Schneider, Piusbriefe; Le Saint Siège et la situation religieuse en Pologne et dans les Pays Baltes 1939–1945 I: 1939–1941, II: 1942–1945 (=ADSS 3, 2 vols.); Le Saint Siège et les victimes de la guerre: Mars 1939–décembre 1940 (=ADSS 6 [1972]); Janvier 1941–décembre 1942 (=ADSS 8 [1974]); Janvier–décembre 1943 (=ADSS 9 [1975]); the documents for 1944/45 appeared in 1978; L. Volk, ed., Akten Kardinal Michael von Faulhabers 1917–1945 I: 1917–1934 (Mainz 1975); II: 1934–1945 (Mainz 1978); B. Stasiewski, ed., Akten deutscher Bischöfe über die Lage der Kirche I: 1933–1934 (Mainz 1968); II: 1934–1935 (Mainz 1976); III: 1935–1936 (Mainz 1978); H. Boberach, ed., Berichte des SD und der Gestapo über Kirchen und Kirchenvolk in Deutschland 1934–1944 (Mainz 1971); Die kirchliche Lage in Bayern nach den Regierungspräsidentenberichten 1933–1943 I: Regierungsbezirk Oberbayern, ed. by H. Witetschek (Mainz 1966); II: Regierungsbezirk Ober- und Mittelfranken, ed. by H. Witetschek (Mainz 1967); III: Regierungsbezirk Schwaben, ed. by H. Witetschek (Mainz 1971), IV: Regierungsbezirk Niederbayern und Oberpfalz 1933–1945, ed. by W. Ziegler (Mainz 1973).

Important Official Publications for Foreign Affairs: For the period to 1918, surveys in: W. Baumgart, ed., Quellenkunde zur deutschen Geschichte der Neuzeit von 1500 bis zur Gegenwart 5; W. Baumgart, Das Zeitalter des Imperialismus und des Ersten Weltkrieges (1871–1918) 1: Akten und Urkunden (Darmstadt 1977).

For the Period after 1918 and the Second World War: USA: Foreign relations of the United States. Diplomatic Papers. Important supplements: The World War, 9 vols. (1928–33); 1919. The Paris Peace Conference, 13 vols. (1942–47); The Lansing Papers 1914–1920, 2 vols. (1939–40); M. C. Taylor, ed., Wartime Correspondence between President Roosevelt and Pope Pius XII (New York 1947).

Germany: Akten zur deutschen auswärtigen Politik 1918–1945: (Series A [1918–25] has not yet been published), Series B (for 1925–33): 1 (Göttingen 1966)–9 (Göttingen 1976), for 1925–28; Series C (for 1933–37): 1 (Göttingen 1971)–5 (Göttingen 1975), for 1933–36; Series D (for 1937–41): 1 (Baden-Baden 1950)–13

(Göttingen 1970); Series E (for 1941–45): 1 (Göttingen 1969)–4 (Göttingen 1975), for 1941–42.

Great Britain: Documents on British Foreign Policy: Series I (for 1919–25): 1 (1947)–20 (1976), for 1919–22; Series IA (for 1925–29): 1 (1966)–7 (1975), for 1925–30; Series II (for 1929–38): 1 (1947)–15 (1975), for 1929–36; Series III (for 1938–39): 1 (1949)–10 (1961).

Italy: Documenti Diplomatici Italiani: Series 5 (for 1914–18): 1 (1954), 4 (1973), for 1914, 1915; Series 6 (for 1918–22): 1 (1956), for 1918/19; Series 7 (for 1922–35): 1 (1953)–9 (1975), for 1922–30; Series 8 (for 1935–39): 12 (1952)–13 (1953), for 1939; Series 9 (for 1939–43): 1 (1954)–5 (1965).

France: Documents Diplomatiques Français 1932–1939: Series 1 (for 1932–35): 1 (1964)–6 (1972), for 1932–34; Series 2 (for 1936–39): 1 (1963)–11 (1977), for 1936–38.

LITERATURE

GENERAL ACCOUNTS OF THE ERA OF THE TWO WORLD WARS: W. J. Mommsen, Das Zeitalter des Imperialismus [1885–1918] (Frankfurt 1969); R. A. C. Parker, Das Zwanzigste Jahrhundert I: 1918–1945 (Frankfurt 1967); T. Schieder, ed., Handbuch der europäischen Geschichte 6: Europa im Zeitalter der Nationalstaaten und der europäischen Weltpolitik bis zum Ersten Weltkrieg (Stuttgart 1968); R. Elze and R. Repgen, eds., Studienbuch Geschichte (Stuttgart 1974); K. D. Bracher, Die Krise Europas 1917–1975 (Frankfurt 1976); P. Renouvin, La crise européenne et la première guerre mondiale 1904–1918 (Paris 1934, 1969); M. Baumont, La faillite de la paix 1918–1939 I: 1918–1935 (Paris 1945, 1967); II: 1936–1939 (Paris 1945, 1968); H. Michel, La seconde guerre mondiale I: 1939–1943 (Paris 1968); II: 1943–1945 (Paris 1969); P. Renouvin, Les crises du XXᵉ siècle I: De 1914 à 1929 (Paris 1957, 1972); II: De 1929 à 1945 (Paris 1958, 1972); P. Gerbod, L'Europe culturelle et religieuse de 1815 à nos jours (Paris 1977); J.-B. Duroselle, Histoire diplomatique de 1919 à nos jours (Paris 1953, 1962); G. M. Gathorne-Hardy, A Short History of International Affairs 1920–1939 (London 1934, 1968); W. Knapp, A History of War and Peace 1939–1965 (London 1967); C. L. Mowat, ed., The Shifting Balance of World Forces 1898–1945 (London 1968); W. P. Potjomkin, ed., Geschichte der Diplomatie (Berlin 1948), II: Die Diplomatie der Neuzeit [1872–1919]; III: Die Diplomatie in der Periode der Vorbereitung des Zweiten Weltkriegs [1919–39] (Communist view).

PAPAL HISTORY: J. Schmidlin, Papstgeschichte der Neuesten Zeit III: Pius X. und Benedikt XV., 1903–1922 (Munich 1936); IV: Pius XI., 1922–1939 (Munich 1939); H. Hermelink, Die katholische Kirche unter den Pius-Päpsten des 20. Jahrhunderts (Zollikon, Zurich 1949); G. Schwaiger, Geschichte der Päpste im 20. Jahrhundert (Munich 1968); G. Maron, Die römisch-katholische Kirche von 1870 bis 1970, in: Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte 4, Nr. N2 (Göttingen 1972); R. Aubert, Vom Kirchenstaat zur Weltkirche. 1818 bis zum Zweiten Vaticanum (=Geschichte der Kirche, V/1) (Zurich 1976).

SYSTEMATIC PROBLEMS OF PAPAL FOREIGN POLICY: W. Gurian and M. A. Fitzsimmons, The Catholic Church in World Affairs (Notre Dame 1954); R. A. Graham, Vatican Diplomacy. A Study of Church and State on the International Plane (Princeton 1959), basic; R. Bosc, La Société Internationale et l'Église. Sociologie et Morale des Relations Internationales (Paris 1961); C. Alix, Le Saint-Siège et les nationalismes en Europe 1870–1960 (Paris 1962); J. Chevalier, La politique du Vatican [1939–69] (Paris 1969); I. Martín, "Die Präsenz des Hl. Stuhls bei den Staaten," Concilium 6 (1970), 571–75; P. Ciprotti, "Funktion, Stellung und Bedeutung des Heiligen Stuhls im internationalen Recht," Concilium 6 (1970), 556–60; H. de Riedmatten, "Die Präsenz des Heiligen Stuhles in den internationalen Organisationen," Concilium 6 (1970), 561–70; K. Gotto, "Die katholische Kirche," H.-P. Schwarz, Handbuch der deutschen Außenpolitik (Munich 1975), 229–33.

THE PONTIFICATES OF THE INDIVIDUAL POPES: G. Rossini, ed., Benedetto XV, i Cattolici e la prima guerra mondiale. Atti del Convegno di Studi tenuto a Spoleto nei giorni 7-8-9 settembre 1962 (Rome 1963); R. Leiber, "Die päpstliche Kriegsfürsorge," StdZ 100 (1921), 197–208; G. Quirico, Il Vaticano et la guerra (Rome 1921); J. Kleijntjens, "Activité charitable de Benoît XV," RHE 43 (1948), 536–45; H. Johnson, Vatican Diplomacy in World War I (Oxford 1933); W. W. Gottlieb, Studies in the Secret Diplomacy during the First World War (London 1957); F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan 1846–1918 II: Die Pontifikate Pius' X. und Benedikts XV., 1903–1918 (Graz 1960); A. Martini, "La preparazione dell'appello di Benedetto XV ai governi belligerenti (1° agosto 1917)," CivCatt 113, 4 (1962), 118–32; A. Martini, "La nota di Benedetto XV ai capi delle nazioni belligerenti (1° agosto 1917)," CivCatt 113, 4 (1962), 417–29; W. Steglich, Die Friedenspolitik der Mittelmächte 1917/18 (Wiesbaden 1964); V. Conzemius, "L'offre du mediation de Benoît XV du 1^{ier} août 1917. Essai d'un bilan provisoire," Religion et Politiques. Les deux guerres mondiales. Histoire de Lyon et du Sud-Est. Mélanges offerts à André Latreille (Lyon 1972), 303–26.

C. M. Cianfarra, The Vatican and the Kremlin (New York 1950); M. Mourin, Le Vatican et l'U.R.S.S. (Paris 1965); J. Kraus, Im Auftrag des Papstes in Rußland. Der Steyler Anteil an der katholischen Hilfsmission 1922–1924 (Steyl 1970); D. J. Dunn, "Stalinism and the Catholic Church during the Era of World War II," CHR 59 (1973), 404–28; O. Simmel, "Die Ostpolitik des Vatikans," Internationale katholische Zeitschrift "Communio" 3 (1974), 555–67; H. Stehle, Die Ostpolitik des Vatikans 1917–1975 (Munich 1975); U. A. Floridi, Mosca e il Vaticano. I dissidenti sovietici di fronte al 'dialogo.' Introduzione di M. Agurskij (Ponte Sesto di Rozzano 1976).

D. Albrecht, ed., Katholische Kirche im Dritten Reich. Eine Aufsatzsammlung (Mainz 1976), with biblio.; R. A. Graham, Il Vaticano e il nazismo (Rome 1975); L. Volk, Das Reichskonkordat vom 20. Juli 1933. Von den Ansätzen in der Weimarer Republik bis zur Ratifizierung am 10. September 1933 (Mainz 1972); M. Maccarone, Il nazionalsocialismo e la Santa Sede (Rome 1947); G. O. Kent, "Pope Pius XII and Germany. Some Aspects of German-Vatican Relations 1933–1945," AHR 70 (1964/65), 59–78; W. Harrigan, "Nazi Germany and the Holy See, 1933–1936: the Historical Background of Mit brennender Sorge," CHR 51 (1965/66), 457–86; L. Volk, "Die Enzyklika Mit brennender Sorge," StdZ 183 (1969), 174–94; H.-A. Raem, Entstehung, Inhalt und Auswirkungen der Enzyklika "Mit brennender Sorge" vom 14. März 1937 in ihrem historischen Kontext (diss., Bonn 1977); P. Duclos, Le Vatican et la seconde guerre mondiale (Paris 1955); B. Martin, Friedensinitiativen und Machtpolitik im Zweiten Weltkrieg 1939–1942 (Düsseldorf 1974); J. Becker, "Der Vatikan und der II. Weltkrieg," D. Albrecht, ed., Katholische Kirche im Dritten Reich (Mainz 1976).

SURVEY OF RESEARCH: R. Lill, "Die Kirchen und das Dritte Reich. Ein Forschungsbericht," W. P. Eckert, ed., Judenhaß—Schuld der Christen?! (Essen 1966), 47–94; V. Conzemius, "Églises chrétiennes et totalitarisme national-socialiste," RHE 63 (1968), 437–503, 868–948; D. Veneruso, "Pio XII e la seconda guerra mondiale," RSCI 22 (1968), 506–53; U. von Hehl, "Kirche, Katholizismus und das nationalsozialistische Deutschland. Ein Forschungsüberblick," D. Albrecht, ed., Katholische Kirche im Dritten Reich (Mainz 1976), 219–51.

4. The Second Vatican Council

Sources and Literature

Because of the great numbers of accounts we present only a selected few.

Pope John XXIII: Writings: Il Giornale dell'Anima (Rome 1964); In Memoria di Mons. Giacomo Maria Radini Tedeschi, vescovo di Bergamo (Bergamo 1916, Rome 1963); Gli inizi del Seminario di Bergamo. Note storiche, con una introduzione sul Concilio di Trento e la fondazione dei primi seminari (Bergamo 1939); Gli Atti della Visita Apostolica di S. Carlo Borromeo a Bergamo, 2 vols. in 5 parts (Florence 1936–57); Il Cardinale Cesare Baronio (Rome 1961); "Souvenirs d'un Nonce," Cahiers de France 1944/53 (Rome 1963); Scritti e discorsi 1953–1958, 4 vols. (Rome 1959–62); Discorsi, messaggi, colloqui del Santo Padre Giovanni XXIII, 6 vols. (Vatican City 1958–65); Lettere ai familiari (Rome 1968; 727 letters, 1901–62).

Official Documents: AAS 50 (1958)–55 (1963); "Dokumentation," Herder-Korrespondenz 17 (1963), 449–76; L. Capovilla, Giovanni XXIII in alcuni scritti di Don Giuseppe De Luca (Brescia 1963), with correspondence, 1945–62, and thoughts of the writer, a friend of the Pope, 133–41.

Biographies: Written during the pontificate and therefore to be used with caution are those by A. Lazzarini, G. Santoro, A. Giovanetti, R. Garret, H. Picker; E. Radius, Giovanni XXIII (Milan 1966); N. Fabretti, Papa Giovanni (Rome 1966); L. Elliott, Johannes XXIII (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1975); E. Balducci, Papa Giovanni (Florence 1964); E. E. Hales, Die große Wende (Graz and Cologne 1966); G. Bara and D. Donadoni, Giorno per giorno con Papa Giovanni (Turin 1966); A. L'Arco, Il segreto di Papa Giovanni (Turin 1967); D. Agasso, Il Papa delle grandi speranze (Milan 1967).

On the Beginnings: D. Cogini, Papa Giovanni nei suoi primi passi a Sotto il Monte (Bergamo 1965); S. Álvarez Menéndez, "Juan XXIII desde el punto de vista jurídico-canónico," Rev. española de derecho canonico 18 (1963), 843–77.

From Obituaries: B. Schneider, StdZ 88 (1962/63), 241–54; G. Schwaiger, AKR 132 (1963), 3–30, with biblio. R. Aubert, "Jean XXIII. Un 'pape de transition' qui marquera dans l'histoire," Revue nouvelle 38 (1963), 3–33; G. Caprile, "Ricchezza di un breve pontificato," CivCatt 1963 II, 523–39; Dahm, Johannes XXIII. (Offenburg, n.d.).

Bibliographies of the Council: A collection by G. Caprile to 1967 in: Herder TK III, 727–31; C. Dollen, Vatican II. A Bibliography (Metuchen, N.J. 1969); R. Laurentin, Bilan du Concile. Histoire, textes, commentaires (Paris 1969), 313–60; G. Garofalo and J. Federici, Dizionario del Concilio Vat. II (Rome 1969).

Preparation: Consultazione per la preparazione del Concilio Vat. II. Dati statistici, ed. by Pontificia Commissione Centrale preparatoria (Vatican City 1961); Acta et documenta Concilio Oecumenico Vaticano II apparando, Series I: Antepraeparatoria, contains Vol. I (1960) Acta Johannis XXIII; Vol. II in 8 sections (1960–61) Consilia et vota episcoporum et praelatorum: Secs. 1–3: Europe, Sec. 4: Asia, Sec. 5: Africa, Sec. 6: North and Central America, Sec. 7: South America and Oceania, Sec. 8: Superiors of Orders, plus 2 vols. of appendices; Vol. III (1961) Proposita et monita SS. Congregationum Curiae Romanae; Vol. IV (1961) Studia et vota universitatum et facultatum ecclesiasticarum et catholicarum, Sec. 1: Rome, Sec. 2: Extra Urbem. —Series II: Praeparatoria: Vol. I (1964) Acta S. P. Johannis XXIII; Vol. II in 4 sections (1965–1968) sessions of the Central Commission. Survey of the schemata prepared by the Prepatory Commission in Herder TK III, 665–726.

Participants: Padri presenti al Concilio Ecumenico Vat. II (Vatican City 1967), published by the Secretariat General. On the Composition: HK 17 (1962/63), 59ff.;

L'Osservatore Romano, special edition, 6 March 1966; R. Caporale, Les hommes du Concile. Étude sociologique sur Vat. II (Paris 1965); M. Galli and B. Moosbrugger, Das Konzil. Ein Text- und Bildbericht (Olten 1965); F. Vallainc, Immagini del Concilio (Rome 1966).

Statistics on various groups: P. A. Ysermans, American Participation in the Second Vatican Council (New York 1967); G. Conus, "L'Église d'Afrique au Concile Vat. II," NZMW 30 (1974), 241–55; 31 (1975) 1–18, 124–42; J. Wnuk, Vatican II. Episkopat Polski na Soborze Vatykanskym (Czytelnik 1964); L'Église Grecque Melkite au Concile. Discours et notes du Patriarche Maximos IV et des Prélats de son Église au Concile Oecumenique Vat. II (Dar Al Kalima, Beirut 1967); W. Dushnyck, The Ukrainian-Rite Catholic Church at the Ecumenical Council 1962/65. A Collection of Articles, Book Reviews, Editorials (New York and Paris 1967), with biblio.; W. Seibel, Zwischenbilanz zum Konzil. Berichte und Dokumente der deutschen Bischöfe (Recklinghausen 1963).

DECREES: Sacrosanctum Oecumenicum Concilium Vaticanum II. Constitutiones, Decreta, Declarationes, cura et studio Secretariae generalis (Vatican City 1966); J. Deretz and A. Nocent, Konkordanz der Konzilstexte (Graz 1968). —Translations and Interpretations: Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil. Konstitutionen, Dekrete u. Erklärungen, lat. u. deutsch. Kommentare, ed. by H. Vorgrimler et al., 3 vols. (Freiburg 1966–68); Vaticanum secundum, ed. by O. Müller, W. Becker and J. Gülden, 4 vols. (Leipzig 1963–66); A. Beckel, H. Reiring and O. B. Roegele, Zweites Vat. Konzil. Dokumente, Texte, Kommentare, 4 vols. (Osnabrück 1963–66); H. Reuter, Das II. Vat. Konzil. Vorgeschichte, Verlauf, Ergebnisse dargestellt nach Dokumenten und Berichten (Cologne 1966); J. C. Hampe, Die Autorität der Freiheit. Gegenwart des Konzils u. Zukunft der Kirche im ökumenischen Disput, 3 vols. (Munich 1967). —English-language editions: The Documents of Vatican II, ed. by Walter M. Abbott (New York, 1966); Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II I-V, ed. by H. Vorgrimler (New York, 1967–69).

INDIVIDUAL DECREES: Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium): Compilation of translations and first commentaries, EphLiturg 78 (1964), 561–72; additional lit. in 79 (1965), 465f. The subsequent volumes of EphLiturg contain all the instructions and relevant decrees; E. J. Lengeling, Die Konstitution des Zweiten Vat. Konzils über die hl. Liturgie (Münster 1964); M. Nicolaw, Constitución Litúrgica del Vat. II (Madrid 1964); special issue of the journal La Maison Dieu 77 (1964); H. Volk, Theologische Grundlagen der Liturgie (Mainz 1964); Miscellanea liturgica in onore di S. Em. il Card. Giacomo Lercara, Arcivescovo di Bologna, Presidente del Consilium per l'applicazione della Costituzione sulla S. Liturgia, 2 vols. (Rome, Paris, Tournai and New York 1966–67); J. Pascher, "Das Wesen der tätigen Teilnahme," II, 11–26 in G. Garrone, Le rôle de la Constitutio de S. Liturgia sur l'évolution du Concile et d'orientation de la pastorale. La Liturgie: Concile et Après Concile, ed. by the abbey of Solesmes (Tournai 1968).

Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium): General: Constitutionis Dogmaticae "Lumen gentium" Synopsis historica, ed. by G. Alberigo and F. Magistretti (Bologna 1975); J. Ratzinger, Konstitution über die Kirche (Münster 1965); G. Philips, L'Église et son mystère au II^e Concile du Vatican. Histoire, texte et commentaire de la Constitution Lumen gentium, 2 vols. (Tournai and Paris 1967–68); De Ecclesia. Beiträge zur Konstitution über die Kirche des II. Vat. Konzils, ed. by G. Barauna, 2 vols. (Freiburg 1966); C. Butler, The Theology of Vat. II (London 1967); P. Parente, Saggio di una Ecclesiologia alla luce del Vat. II (Rome 1968); H. Holstein, Hiérarchie et Peuple de Dieu d'après Lumen gentium (Paris 1970); W. Aymans, "Die Communio ecclesiarum als Gestaltgesetz der einen Kirche," AKR 139 (1970), 69–90; A. Acerbi, Due ecclesiologie. Ecclesiologia giuridica ed ecclesiologia di communione nella "Lumen gentium" (Bologna 1975); H. Schauf, "Zur Textgeschichte grundlegender Aussagen aus 'Lumen gentium' über das Bischofskollegium," AKR 64 (1972), 5–147; K. Rahner and J. Ratzinger, Episkopat und Primat (Freiburg 1961); U. Betti, La dottrina sull'Episcopato nel cap. III della Costituzione dommatica Lumen gentium (Rome 1968); W. Bertrams, Papst und Bischofskollegium als Träger der kirchlichen Hirtengewalt (Munich 1965); W. Aymans, AKR 135 (1966), 136–47. —Miscellaneous: J. Neumann, "Weihe und Amt in der Lehre von der Kirchenverfassung des Zweiten Vat. Konzils," AKR 135 (1966), 3–18; G. Rambaldi, "Note sul sacerdozio e sul sacramento dell'Ordine nella Costituzione Lumen gentium," Gregorianum 47 (1966), 517–41; P. J. Cordes, Sendung zum Dienst. Exegetisch-historische u. systematische Studien zum Konzildekret "Vom Dienst und Leben der Priester" (Frankfurt 1972); J. Ratzinger, Die kirchliche Lehre vom Sacramentum ordinis: Pluralisme et Oecumenisme en Recherches théologiques (Paris 1976), 155–66. No. 5 (1976) of La Scuola Catholica is devoted to ordinations; P. Bläser, "Die Kirche u. die Kirchen," Catholica 18 (1964), 89–107; W. Kasper, "Der ekklesiologische Charakter der nichtkatholischen Kirchen," ThQ 145 (1965), 42–62; E. Lamirande, "La signification ecclésiologique des communités dissidentes et la doctrine des 'Vestigia ecclesiae," Istina 10 (1964), 25–58; R. Laurentin, La Vierge au Concile (Paris 1965).

Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum): J. R. Geiselmann, Die Hl. Schrift u. die Tradition (Freiburg 1962), in opposition, H. Lennertz, Gregorianum 40 (1959), 38–53; Y. Congar, La Tradition et les traditions, 2 vols. (Paris 1960–63); K. Rahner and J. Ratzinger, Offenbarung und Überlieferung (Freiburg 1965); E. Stakemeier, Die Konzilskonstitution über die göttliche Offenbarung. Werden, Inhalt und theologische Bedeutung (Paderborn 1966); O. Semmelroth and M. Zerwick, Vaticanum II über das Wort Gottes (Stuttgart 1966); J. Beumer, Die kath. Inspirationslehre zwischen Vaticanum I u. II (Stuttgart 1966); N. Lohfink, Katholische Bibelwissenschaft u. historisch-kritische Methode (Kevelaer 1966); A. Vögtle, Die Kirche u. das Wort Gottes (Würzburg 1967); H. de Lubac, L'Écriture dans la tradition (Paris 1966); A. Bea, Das Wort Gottes u. die Menschheit. Die Lehre des Konzils über die Offenbarung (Stuttgart 1968); H. Waldenfels, Offenbarung. Das II. Vat. Konzil auf dem Hintergrund der neueren Theologie (Munich 1969).

Pastoral Constitution on the Church (Gaudium et Spes): Commentaries on the individual chaps. in Vorgrimler, Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II I, 105–305; R. Tucci, "Introduzione storico-dottrinale alla Costituzione pastorale 'Gaudium et spes,'" La Chiesa e il mondo contemporaneo nel Vaticano II (Turin 1966), 17–134; L'Église dans le monde de ce temps (Paris 1967) (=Unam sanctam 65) with contributions by K. Rahner, H. de Reidmatten, M.-D. Chenu, E. Schillebeeckx et al.; J. Oelinger, Christliche Weltverantwortung. Die Kirche in der Welt von heute (Cologne 1968); Commentaries on the Pastoral Constitution of the Second Vatican Council in this series as Vol. 8: A. Langner, Die politische Gemeinschaft (Cologne 1968); as Vol. 10: H. de Riedmatten, Die Völkergemeinschaft (Cologne 1969).

NEWS COVERAGE: Press and Radio: W. Kampe, Das Konzil im Spiegel der Presse (Würzburg 1963), deals only with the first session; E. L. Hestow, The Press and Vatican II (Notre Dame and London 1967). Many continuing press and radio reports were issued collectively: those for the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung by J. Schmitz van Vorst in four booklets, one for each session; L. Waltermann, Konzil als Prozeß. Berichte im Westdeutschen Rundfunk über das II. Vatikanum (Cologne 1966); H. Helbling, Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil. Ein Bericht (Basel 1966); A. Wenger (La Croix), Vatican II, 4 booklets (Paris 1963–68); R. Laurentin (Le Figaro), L'enjeu du Concile, 3 vols. (Paris 1963–65), in: Bilan du Concile (Paris 1966); H. Fesquet (Le Monde), Le Journal du Concile (Le Jas 1966); G. Caprile (Civiltà Cattolica), Il concilio Vat. II Cronache edite da "Civiltà Cattolica," 5 vols. (Rome 1965–69), R. La Valle, Coraggio del Concilio, 3 booklets (Brescia 1964–66); B. Kloppenburg, Concilio Vat. II, 5 vols. (Petropolis 1962–66); J. L. Martin Descalzo, Un periodista en el Concilio, 4 vols. (Madrid 1963–66); X. Rynne (pseudonym), From Vatican City. Vat. Council II, Background and Debates, 4 vols. (London 1963–65); id., La révolution des Jean XXIII (Paris 1963); J. Ratzinger, Vaticanum II. Ergebnisse und Probleme, 4 booklets (Cologne 1963–66); Y. Congar, Vatican II Le Concile au jour le jour, 4 booklets (Paris 1963–66).

PROTESTANT OBSERVERS: O. Cullman and L. Vischer, Zwischen zwei Konzilssessionen. Rückblick und Ausschau zweier protestantischer Beobachter (Zurich 1963); J. C. Hampe, Ende der Gegenreformation (Stuttgart and Mainz 1964); M. Lackmann, Mit evangelischen Augen. Beobachtungen eines Lutheraners auf dem II. Vat. Konzil (Graz 1963–66); Dialog unterwegs. Eine evangelische Bestandsaufnahme zum Konzil, ed. by G. A. Lindseck (Göttingen 1965); Was bedeutet das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil für uns, ed. by W. Schaetz (Basel 1966); G. Richard Molard, Un pasteur au Concile (Paris 1964); D. Horton, Vatican Diary 1963. A Protestant Observes the Second Session of Vat. Council II (Philadelphia and Boston 1964); R. M. Brown, Observer in Rome. A Protestant Report on the Vatican Council (Garden City, New York 1964).

EVALUATION AND RETROSPECT: J. Höffner, Selbstverständnis und Perspektiven des Zweiten Vaticanischen Konzils (Cologne and Opladen 1965); E. H. Schillebeeckx, Die Signatur des II. Vaticanums. Rückblick nach drei Sitzungsperioden (Vienna, Freiburg and Basel 1965); M. Plate, Weltereignis Konzil. Darstellung—Sinn—Ergebnis (Freiburg 1966); O. Karrer, Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil. Reflexionen zu seiner geschichtlichen und geistlichen Wirklichkeit (Munich 1966); D. A. Seeber, Das Zweite Vaticanum. Konzil des Übergangs (Freiburg 1966); K. Rahner, O. Cullman and H. Fries, Sind die Erwartungen erfüllt? Überlegungen nach dem Konzil (Munich 1966); M. v. Galli, Das Konzil und seine Folgen (Lucerne and Frankfurt 1967). M. Serafian (pseudonym), La difficile scelta. Il Concilio e la Chiesa fra Giovanni XXIII e Paolo VI (Milan 1964); P. Felici, Il lungo camino del Concilio (Milan 1967); G. Palazzini, Il Concilio Ecumenico Vat. II. Tra cronaca e storia (Rome 1966); L. M. Carli, La Chiesa a Concilio (Milan 1964); C. Reymondin and L. Richard, Vatican II au Travail. Méthodes conciliaires et documents (Tours 1965); G. Garrone, Le Concile. Orientations (Paris 1966); J. Leclercq, Vatican II—un Concile pastorale (Brussels 1966); R. Prévost, Pierre ou le Chaos (Paris 1965); M. Nicolau, Laicado y Santidad ecclesial, Colegialidad y Libertad religiosa. Nuevos problemos del Concilio Vat. (Madrid 1964); J. Elizalde, Concilio, categoria y anecdota, 2 vols. (Zaragoza 1965–66); El Concilio visto por los peritos españoles (Madrid 1965); G. Bull, Vatican Politics at the Second Vatican Council 1962/65 (London 1966); L. M. Redmond, The Council Reconsidered (Dublin 1966); G. McCoin, What Happened at Rome? The Council and Its Implications for the Modern World (New York 1966); R. Wiltgen, The Rhine Flows into the Tiber. The Unknown Council (New York 1967); J. Moorman, Vatican Observed. An Anglican Impression of Vat. II (London 1967); The Second Vat. Council, Studies by Eight Anglican Observers, ed. by G. C. Pauley (London 1967); L. Vischer, Überlegungen nach dem Vat. Konzil (Zurich 1966); H. Schlink, Nach dem Konzil (Munich and Hamburg 1966); H. Helbling, Die evangelischen Christen u. das Konzil (Würzburg 1967); Wir sind gefragt. Antworten evangelischer Konzilsbeobachter, ed. by J. W. Kantzenbach and V. Vajta (Göttingen 1966).

5. The Code of Canon Law and the Development of Canon Law to 1974

SOURCES AND LITERATURE

FOR CIC: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1917–1974; N. Hilling, "Die gesetzgeberische Tätigkeit Benedikts XV. bis zur Promulgation des Codex iuris canonici," AfkKR 98 (1918), 223–

39, 398–406, 561–74; J. Noval, Codificationis juris canonici recensio historico-apologetica (Rome 1918); N. Hilling, "Zur Promulgation des Codex iuris canonici," AfkKR 98 (1918), 71–86; A. Scharnagl, Das neue kirchliche Gesetzbuch (Munich and Regensburg 1918); U. Stutz, Der Geist des CIC (Stuttgart 1918); A. Ortscheid, Essai concernant la nature de la codification et son influence sur la science juridique, d'après le concept du Code de Droit Canonique (Paris 1922); P. Gasparri and I. Serédi, Codicis Iuris Canonici Fontes, 9 vols. (Rome 1923–39); M. Falco, Introduzione allo studio del, "Codex iuris canonici," (Turin 1925); Y. de la Brière, "La carrière du Cardinal Gasparri. Codification canonique et pactes concordataires," Études CCII (1930), 595–606; K. Mörsdorf, Die Rechtssprache des CIC (Paderborn 1937); P. Gasparri, "Storia della Codificazione del diritto canonico per la Chiesa latina," Acta Congressus Juridici Internationalis IV (Rome 1937), 1–10; F. Cimetier, Pour étudier le Code de Droit Canonique. Introduction générale. Bibliographie. Réponses et décisions. Documents complémentairs. 1917–1938 (Paris 1938); D. Staffa, "Imperfezioni e lacune del primo libro del Codice di diritto canonico," Miscellanea in memoriam Card. Gasparri (Rome 1960), 45–73; K. Mörsdorf, "Der CIC und die nichtkatholischen Christen," AfkKR 130 (1961), 31–58; H. Schmitz, Die Gesetzessystematik des CIC Liber I-III, 18 vols. (Munich 1963); S. Kuttner, "The Code of Canon Law in Historical Perspective," The Jurist 28 (1968), 129–48.

ON THE DEVELOPMENT FROM 1918 TO 1962: N. Hilling, ed., CIC Supplementum, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1925–31); I. Bruno, CIC Interpretationes Authenticae seu Responsa a PCI a. 1917–1935 data (Vatican City 1935); Supplement for the years 1936–50 (Vatican City 1950); E. G. Regatillo, Interpretatio et jurisprudentia CIC (Santander 1949); S. Mayer, ed., Neueste Kirchenrechts-Sammlung, 4 vols. (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1953–62); X. Ochoa, ed. Leges Ecclesiae post Codicem iuris canonici editae, 4 vols. (Rome 1966–74); N. Hilling, "Die gesetzgeberische Tätigkeit Benedikts XV. seit der Promulgation des Codex iuris canonici," AfkKR 103 (1923), 5–36; id., "Zum zehnjährigen Jubiläum des Codex Juris Canonici," AfkKR 108 (1928), 385–408; id. Die Gesetzgebung des Hl. Stuhles seit der Kodifikation im Jahre 1917," AfkKR 112 (1932), 3–36; id., "Die Gesetzgebung des Papstes Pius XI," AfkKR 119 (1939), 309–51; 120 (1940), 4–32, 169–200; S. Mayer, "Bedeutung Papst Pius' XII. für das Recht, besonders das Kirchenrecht," AfkKR 130 (1961), 436–71.

ON THE DEVELOPMENT SINCE THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL: F. Romita, ed., Normae exsequutivae Concilii Oecumenici Vaticani II (1963–69) (Naples 1971); H. Barion, "Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil. Kanonistischer Bericht (I), (II), (III)," Der Staat 3 (1964), 221–26; 4 (1965) 341–59; 5 (1966) 341–52; Lois et institutions nouvelles de l'Eglise catholique (Paris 1966); L. M. Örsy, "Quantity and Quality of Laws after Vatican II," The Jurist 27 (1967), 385–412; F. Romita, Il Diritto Canonico dopo il Concilio Vaticano II (=Bibliotheca Monitor Ecclesiasticus 20) (Naples 1970); W. Bertrams, "Die Bedeutung des Vatikanischen Konzils für das Kirchenrecht," ÖAfKR 23 (1972), 125–62; U. Mosiek, "Die neueste Rechtsprechung der S. R. Rota," ÖAfKR 24 (1973), 160–99.

ON THE REFORM OF CANON LAW: K. Mörsdorf, "Grundfragen einer Reform des kanonischen Rechtes," MThZ 15 (1964), 1–16; id., "Streiflichter zur Reform des kanonischen Rechts," AfkKR 135 (1966) 38–52; E. Veis, Zur Reform des kanonischen Rechts. Das Gespräch vor dem Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzil. (diss., Freiburg i. Brsg. 1966); R. Bidagor, "La revisión del Código de Derecho Canónico—sus problemas," Gregorianum 49 (1968), 253–64; P. Feleci, "Il Concilio Vaticano II e la nuova codificazione," Apollinaris 42 (1969), 7–19; O. Giacchi, "Innovazione e tradizione nella Chiesa dopo il Concilio," Ephemerides Iuris Canonici 26 (1970), 9–24; F. Romita, "Quo iure vivimus post Vaticanum II': dal Codice Piano-Benedettino al futuro Codice Conciliare," Monitor Ecclesiasticus 95 (1970), 229–41; G. Baldanza, L'incidenza della teologia conciliare nella riforma del diritto canonico (=Bibliotheca Monitor Ecclesiasticus 26) (Naples 1970); R. G. Cunningham, "The Principles Guiding the Revision of the Code of Canon Law," The Jurist 30 (1970), 447–55; P. Lombardia, "Principios y técnicas del nuevo Derecho Canónico," Ius Canonicum 11 (1971), 22–36; R. Bidagor, "La Commission pontificale pour la révision du Code de Droit canonique," L'Annee Canonique 15 (1971), 97–107; J. Maldonado, "Los juristas ante el momento actual del Derecho Canónico," Ius Canonicum 11 (1971), 37–67; F. Finocchiaro, "La codificazione del diritto canonico e l'ora presente," Ephemerides Iuris Canonici 27 (1971), 251–72; W. M. Plöchl, "Um ein neues katholisches Kirchenrecht," ÖAfKR 23 (1972), 273–89; R. Baccari, "La Carità, sorgente della nuova legislazione canonica," Monitor Ecclesiasticus 97 (1972), 427–38; P. Fedele, "A proposito delle innovazioni proposte dalla Commissione per la revisione del C.I.C. in tema di consenso matrimoniale," L'Annee Canonique 17 (1973), 365–412; P. Felici, "De Opere Codicis Iuris Canonici Recognoscendi," ÖAfKR 25 (1974), 117–28; A. Scheuermann, "Das Schema 1973 für das kommende kirchliche Strafrecht," AfkKR 143 (1974), 3–63; K. Mörsdorf, "Zum Problem der Exkommunikation, Bemerkungen zum Schema Documenti quo disciplina sanctionum seu poenarium in Ecclesia Latina denuo ordinatur," ibid., 64–68; H. Schmitz, "Revision des kirchlichen Hochschulrechts," ibid., 69–100.

ON THE Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis: Schema Legis Ecclesiae Fundamentalis. Textus emendatus cum relatione de ipso schemate deque emendationibus receptis (Vatican City 1971); "Relatio universas contrahens generales animadversiones ad Schema Legis Ecclesiae fundamentalis ab Episcopis propositas," Communicationes 4 (1972), 122–68; El Proyecto de Ley Fundamental de la Iglesia. Texto y análisis crítico. Redacción Ius Canonicum (=Cuadernos de la Colección Canónica 13) (Pamplona 1971); V. Marcolino, A propósito da Lei Fundamental da Igreja (Braga 1971); "Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis. Bericht über die Arbeitsergebnisse eines Kanonistischen Symposions in München 1971," AfkKR 140 (1971), 407–506; L'Année Canonique 15 (1971), 593–95; 16 (1972) 13f.; W. Bertrams, "De praemissis et principiis Legis Fundamentalis Ecclesiae," Periodica 60 (1971), 511–47; G. Thils, Une "Loi Fondamentale de l'Église"? (Louvain 1971); W. Bertrams, "Communio, communitas et societas in Lege Fundamentalis Ecclesiae," Periodica 61 (1972), 553–604; R. Sobański, "La 'Loi fondamentale' de l'Église. Quelques réflexions," NRTh 94 (1972), 251–68; J. Beyer, "De Legis Ecclesiae Fundamentalis redactione, natura et crisi," Periodica 61 (1972), 525–51; J. Manzanares, "De Schemate Legis Ecclesiae Fundamentalis in Colloquio Hispano-Germanico adnotationes," Periodica 61 (1972), 647–62; L. Michelini di San Martino, Lo Schema Legis Ecclesiae Fundamentalis e gli Ordinamenti Laici, (=Bibliotheca Monitor Ecclesiasticus 37) (Naples 1972); B. Gangoiti, "Possibilità, convenienza e contenuto di una legge fondamentale nella Chiesa," Angelicum 49 (1972), 315–47; L. Vela Sánchez, "Christifidelium officia et iura fundamentalia descripta in Legis Fundamentalis Schematis textu emendato," Periodica 61 (1972), 605–23.

6. The Holy See's Policy of Concordats from 1918 to 1974

SOURCES

Acta Apostolica Sedis 1908–74; A. Mercati, Raccolta di Concordati su materie ecclesiastiche tra la Santa Sede e le autorità civili, 2 vols. (Rome 1919–54); Z. Giacometti, Quellen zur

Geschichte der Trennung von Staat und Kirche (Tübingen 1926); A. Giannini, I concordati postbellici, 2 vols. (Milan 1929–36); J. M. Restrepo, Concordats conclus durant le Pontificat de Sa Sainteté le Pape Pie XI traduits en Latin et en Français (Rome 1934); M. Nasalli-Rocca de Corneliano, Concordatorum Pii XI P.M. Concordantiae (Rome 1940); Patti Lateranensi, Convenzioni e Accordi successivi fra il Vaticano e l'Italia fino al 31 dicembre 1945 (Vatican City 1972); Convenzioni ed accordi fra il Vaticano e l'Italia II: Dal 1° Gennaio 1946 al 31 Dicembre 1954 (Vatican City 1955); A. J. Peaslee, Constitutions of Nations, 3d ed., 4 vols., ed. by D. Peaslee Xydis (The Hague 1965–70); A. Perugini, Concordata vigentia (Rome 1950); H. Liermann, ed., Kirchen und Staat, 2 vols. (Munich 1954–55); W. Weber, Die deutschen Konkordate und Kirchenverträge der Gegenwart. Textausgabe mit den amtlichen Begründungen sowie mit Ergänzungsbestimmungen, vergleichenden Übersichten, Schrifttumshinweisen und einem Sachverzeichnis, 2 vols. (Göttingen 1962–71); J. Wenner, Reichskonkordat und Länderkonkordate (Paderborn 1964); L. Schöppe, Konkordate seit 1800. Originaltext und deutsche Übersetzung der geltenden Konkordate (Frankfurt am Main and Berlin 1964); L. Schöppe, Neue Konkordate und konkordatäre Vereinbarungen, Abschlüsse in den Jahren 1964–1969. Nachtrag zu "Konkordate seit 1800" (Hamburg 1970); E. R. Huber and W. Huber, eds., Staat und Kirche im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert. Dokumente zur Geschichte des deutschen Staatskirchenrechts I: Staat und Kirche vom Ausgang des alten Reiches bis zum Vorabend der bürgerlichen Revolution (Berlin 1973); A. Läpple, Der Religionsunterricht 1945–1975. Dokumentation eines Weges (Aschaffenburg 1975).

LITERATURE

F. von Lama, Papst und Kurie in ihrer Politik nach dem Weltkrieg (Illertissen, Bavaria 1925); E. R. Huber, Verträge zwischen Staat und Kirche im Deutschen Reich (Breslau 1930); G. J. Ebers, Staat und Kirche im neuen Deutschland (Munich 1930); N. Hilling, "Die Konkordatsfrage," AfkKR 110 (1930), 121–35; E. Schneider, Die Umschreibung der Bistümer in den Nachkriegskonkordaten (Paderborn 1930); U. Stutz, "Konkordat und Codex," Sitzungsberichte der Preußischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Phil.-hist. Klasse XXXII (Berlin 1930), 688–706; A. M. Koeniger, Die neuen deutschen Konkordate und Kirchenverträge mit der preußischen Zirkumskriptionsbulle (Bonn and Cologne 1932); A. Bertola, "Attività concordataria e codificazione del diritto della chiesa," Archivio Giuridico "Filippo Serafini" 111 (1934), 137–77; G. Goetz, Die schulrechtlichen Bestimmungen der neueren und neuesten europäischen Konkordate in ihrer Beziehung zur jeweiligen staatlichen Schulgesetzgebung (diss., Lam, Bavaria 1936); L. Salvatorelli, La politica della Santa Sede dopo la guerra (Milan 1937); Y. de la Brière, "Le droit concordataire dans la Nouvelle Europe," Recueil des Cours 63 (1938), 367–468; H. Barion, "Die kirchliche Betreuung völkischer Minderheiten," Jahrbuch der Akademie für deutsches Recht 5 (1938), 25–36; id., "Konkordat und Codex," Festschrift Ulrich Stutz (=Kirchenrechtliche Abhandlungen 117 and 118) (Stuttgart 1938), 371–88; M. Bendiscioli, La politica della Santa Sede. Direttive—organi—realizzazione. 1918–1938 (Florence 1939); W. Weber, Die politische Klausel in den Konkordaten (Hamburg 1939); H. Barion, "Über doppelsprachige Konkordate. Eine konkordatstechnische Studie," Deutsche Rechtswissenschaft 5 (1940), 226–49; L. Link, Die Besetzung der kirchlichen Ämter in den Konkordaten Papst Pius' XI. (=Kanonistische Studien und Texte 18/19) (diss., Bonn 1942); J. H. Kaiser, Die Politische Klausel der Konkordate (Berlin and Munich 1949); J. Salomon, "La politique concordataire des États depuis la fin de la deuxième guerre mondiale," Revue générale de droit international public 59 (1955), 578–623; H. H. Schrey, Die Generation der Entscheidung. Staat und Kirche in Europa und im europäischen Rußland bis 1953 (Munich 1955); R. Metz, "Le choix des évêques dans les récents concordats (1918–1954)," L'Année Canonique 3 (1956), 75–98; H. Schmieden, Recht und Staat in den Verlautbarungen der katholischen Kirche (Bonn 1961); H. Maier, "Kirche und Staat seit 1945. Ihr Verhältnis in den wichtigsten europäischen Ländern," Geschichte in Wissenschaft und Unterricht 14 (1963), 558-90, 694–716, 741–73; G. Catalano, Problematica giuridica dei concordati (Milan 1963); A. Albrecht, Koordination von Staat und Kirche in der Demokratie (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1965); Das Verhältnis von Kirche und Staat. Erwägungen zur Vielfalt der geschichtlichen Entwicklung und gegenwärtigen Situation (=Studien und Berichte der Katholischen Academie in Bayern Heft 30) (Würzburg 1965); A. Hollerbach, Verträge zwischen Staat und Kirche in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (Frankfurt 1965); J. Lucien-Brun, "Une nouvelle étape dans le droit concordataire," Annuaire français de droit international 11 (1965/66), 113–21; R. Metz, "L'intervention du pouvoir civil dans la nomination des évêques, des vicaires apostoliques et des vicaires aux armées, d'après les conventions signées au cours des années 1955 à 1965," Revue de droit canonique 16 (1966), 219–50; C. M. Corral Salvador, "Libertad de la Iglesia y intervención de los Estados en los nombramientos episcopales," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 21 (1966), 63–92; K. Rahner, H. Maier, U. Mann, M. Schmaus, Religionsfreiheit. Ein Problem für Staat und Kirche (Munich 1966); K. Obermayer, "Die Konkordate und Kirchenverträge im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert," W. P. Fuchs, ed., Staat und Kirche im Wandel der Jahrhunderte (Stuttgart 1966), 166–83; P. Zepp, "Die Religionsfreiheit in den Konkordaten," H. Lentze and I. Gampl, eds., Speculum iuris et ecclesiarum. Festschrift für Willibald M. Plöchl (Vienna 1967), 417–25; O. Dibelius, Überstaatliche Verbindungen der Kirchen und Religionsfreiheit (diss., Bonn 1967); H. Reis, "Konkordat und Kirchenvertrag in der Staatsverfassung," Jahrbuch des öffentlichen Rechts der Gegenwart, n.s. 17 (1968), 165–394; G. Lajolo, I concordati moderni. La natura giuridica internazionale dei concordati alla luce di recente prassi diplomatica. Successione di Stati—Clausola "rebus sic stantibus" (Brescia 1968); A. Hollerbach, "Die neuere Entwicklung des Konkordatsrechts,"Jahrbuch des öffentlichen Rechts der Gegenwart, n.s. 17 (1968), 117–63; A. W. Ziegler, Religion, Kirche und Staat in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 vols. (Munich 1969–74); A. De La Hera, "Confesionalidad del Estado y libertad religiosa," Ius Canonicum 12 (1972), 86–104; R. Moya, "El concordato en las actuales relaciones entre la Iglesia y el Estado," Angelicum 49 (1972), 348–66; C. Corral, "De relatione inter Ecclesiam et Statum in Schemate Legis Ecclesiae Fundamentalis," Periodica 61 (1972), 625–45; P. Leisching, Kirche und Staat in den Rechtsordnungen Europas. Ein Überblick (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1973); J. Sartorius, Staat und Kirchen im francophonen Schwarzafrika und auf Madagaskar. Die religionsgeschichtliche Entwicklung vom Beginn der Kolonialzeit bis heute (Munich 1973).

SECTION TWO

The Diversity of the Inner Life of the Universal Church

7. Society and State as a Problem for the Church

SOURCES

E. Marmy, ed.; Mensch und Gemeinschaft in christlicher Schau. Dokumente (from Gregory XVI, 1832, to Pius XII, 1944) (Fribourg 1945) A. F. Utz, O.P., and J. F. Groner, O.P., eds.; Aufbau und Entfaltung des gesellschaftlichen Lebens. Soziale Summe Pius' XII., 3 vols. (Fribourg 1954–61), Vols. 1 and 2 1963; Discorsi e Radiomessaggi di Sua Santità Pio VII., 20 vols. (Vatican City 1941–59); John XXIII, Scritti e discorsi (Siena 1959 ff.); A. F. Utz, O.P., ed., La Doctrine Sociale de l'Église à travers les Siècles, 4 vols. (Paris 1970); H. Schnatz, ed., Päpstliche Verlautbarungen zu Staat und Gesellschaft. Originaldokumente mit deutscher Übersetzung (Darmstadt 1973); I. Giordani, ed., Pensiero sociale della Chiesa oggi. Documenti di Giovanni XXIII, di Paolo VI e del Concilio Vaticano II (Rome 1974).

LITERATURE

TRANSLATIONS AND COMMENTARIES OF ECCLESIASTICAL DOCUMENTS: G. Gundlach, S.J., Die sozialen Rundschreiben Leos XIII. und Pius' XI. Text und deutsche Übersetzung samt systematischen Inhaltsübersichten und einheitlichem Sachregister (Paderborn 1931); O. v. Nell-Breuning, S.J., Die soziale Enzyklika. Erläuterungen zum Weltrundschreiben Papst Pius' XI. Über die gesellschaftliche Ordnung (Cologne 1932, reprinted 1958/63); G. Gundlach, S.J., Die Kirche zur heutigen Wirtschafts- und Gesellschaftsnot. Erläuterungen des Rundschreibens Papst Pius' XI. "Quadragesimo anno" (Berlin 1949); P. Jostock, Die sozialen Rundschreiben: Leo XIII., Über die Arbeiterfrage. Pius XI., Über die gesellschaftliche Ordnung (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1963); E. Welty, OP Die Sozialenzyklika Papst Johannes' XXIII. "Mater et Magistra." Mit ausführlichem Kommentar sowie einer Einführung in die Soziallehre der Päpste (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1965); J. Hünermann, Die soziale Gerechtigkeit. Erläuterungen zum Sozialrundschreiben Johannes' XXIII. "Mater et Magistra" (Essen 1962); O. V. Nell-Breuning, S.J., "Mater et Magistra," StdZ 169 (1961/62), 116–28; J. Bless, Mater et Magistra und praktische Wirtschafts- und Socialpolitik. Erläuterungen und Erwägungen zur Sozialbotschaft Johannes' XXIII. (Lucerne and Stuttgart 1965); A. F. Utz, O.P., Die Friedensenzyklika Papst Johannes' XXIII. "Pacem in terris." Mit einer Einführung in die Lehre der Päpste über die Grundlagen der Politik und einem Kommentar (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1965); J. Hünermann, Kommentar zur Friedensenzyklika "Pacem in terris" (Essen 1963); A. F. Utz, O.P., "Der politische Realismus Johannes' XXIII. in der Enzyklika Pacem in terris," Die neue Ordnung 19 (1965), 241–49.

GENERAL AND INTRODUCTORY ACCOUNTS OF SOCIAL DOCTRINE: W. Schwer, Katholische Gesellschaftslehre (Paderborn 1928); J. B. Schuster, Die Soziallehre der Kirche nach Leo XIII. und Pius XII. (Freiburg 1935); O. v. Nell-Breuning, SJ, Zur christlichen Gesellschaftslehre. Beiträge zu einem Wörterbuch der Politik 1 (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1947); id., Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft heute, 3 vols. (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1955 ff.); E. Muhler, Die Soziallehre der Päpste (Munich 1958); N. Monzel, Solidarität und Selbstverantwortung.

Beiträge zur christlichen Soziallehre (Munich 1959); F. Klüber, Grundlagen der katholischen Gesellschaftslehre (Osnabrück 1960); E. Welty, O.P., Herders Sozialkatechismus. Ein Werkbuch der katholischen Sozialethik in Frage und Antwort 1 (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1963); 2 (1965); 3 (1962); G. Gundlach, S.J., Die Ordnung der menschlichen Gesellschaft, 2 vols. (Cologne 1964); W. Weber, "Kirchliche Soziallehre," E. Neuhäusler and E. Gossman, eds., Was ist Theologie? (Munich 1966), 244–65; J. Höffner, Christliche Gesellschaftslehre (Kevalaer 1975); N. Monzel, Katholische Soziallehre, 2 vols. (Cologne 1965–67); J. Messner, Das Naturrecht (Innsbruck, Vienna and Munich 1966); J. Höffner, Gessellschaftspolitik aus christlicher Verantwortung, ed. by W. Schreiber and W. Dreier (Münster 1966); Jahrbuch des Instituts für Christliche Sozialwissenschaften der Westf. Wilhelms-Universität Münster, ed. by J. Höffner (Münster 1960 ff.) (since 1968: Jahrbuch für Christliche Sozialwissenschaften, ed. by W. Weber [Münster 1968 ff.]); Civitas. Jahrbuch für christliche Gesellschaftsordnung, ed. by Heinrich-Pesch-Haus (Mannheim 1962 ff.).

Natural Law and Revelation: M. Manser, O.P., Das Naturrecht in thomistischer Beleuchtung (Fribourg 1944); H. Rommen, Die ewige Wiederkehr des Naturrechts (Munich 1947); J. Fuchs, Lex Naturae. Zur Theologie des Naturrechts (Düsseldorf 1955); R. Henning, Der Maßstab des Rechts im Rechtsdenken der Gegenwart (Münster 1961); E. Haag, Die Entwicklung der neueren katholischen Naturrechtslehre (Zurich 1962); F. Böckle, ed., Das Naturrecht im Disput (Düsseldorf 1966); K. Peschke, Naturrecht in der Kontroverse. Kritik evangelischer Theologie an der katholischen Lehre von Naturrecht und natürlicher Sittlichkeit (Salzburg 1967); H. D. Schelauske, Naturrechtsdiskussion in Deutschland. Ein Überblick über zwei Jahrzehnte: 1945–1965 (Cologne 1968); J. David, Das Naturrecht in Krise und Läuterung. Eine kritische Neubesinnung (Cologne 1969); J. Gründel, "Naturrecht," Sacramentum Mundi III (1969), 707–19; Herr, Zur Frage nach dem Naturrecht im deutschen Protestantismus der Gegenwart ed. by W. Weber and A. Rauscher (Paderborn 1972); F. Böckle and E. W. Böckenforde, eds., Naturrecht in der Kritik (Mainz 1973).

Social Principles: G. Gundlach, S.J., "Solidarismus, Einzelmensch, Gemeinschaft," Gregorianum 17 (1936), 265 ff.; O. v. Nell-Breuning, S.J., Einzelmensch und Gesellschaft (Heidelberg 1950); id. "Solidarismus," Wörterbuch der Politik 5/2 (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1951), 357–76; A. P. Verpaalen, Der Begriff des Gemeinwohls bei Thomas von Aquin. Ein Beitrag zum Problem des Personalismus, Sammlung Politeia IV (Heidelberg 1954); A. F. Utz, O.P., "Der Personalismus," Die neue Ordnung 8 (1954), 270 ff.; id. Formen und Grenzen des Subsidiaritätsprinzips (Heidelberg 1965); A. Rauscher, S.J., Subsidiaritätsprinzip und Berufsständische Ordnung in "Quadragesimo anno" (Münster 1958); G. Wildmann, Personalismus, Solidarismus und Gesellschaft. Der ethische und ontologische Grundcharakter der Gesellschaftslehre der Kirche (Vienna 1961); J. Höffner, A. Verdross, and F. Vito eds., Naturordnung in Gesellschaft, Staat, Wirtschaft. Festschrift für J. Messner (Vienna 1961); J. Messner, Das Gemeinwohl. Idee, Wirklichkeit, Aufgaben (Osnabrück 1962); G. Gundlach, S.J., "Solidaritätsprinzip," Staatslexikon 7 (1962), 119–22; id., Die Ordnung der menschlichen Gesellschaft, 2 vols. (Cologne 1964); J. Schwarte, Gustav Gundlach S.J. (1892–1963). Maßgeblicher Repräsentant der katholischen Soziallehre während der Pontifikate Pius' XI. und Pius XII. (Paderborn 1975).

State, Authority, and Democracy: H. Rommen, Der Staat in der katholischen Gedankenwelt (Paderborn 1935); O. v. Nell-Breuning, S.J., Zur christlichen Staatslehre, Beiträge zu einem Wörterbuch der Politik 2 (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1947); H. Schmieden, Recht und Staat in den Verlautbarungen der katholischen Kirche (Bonn 1961); F. M. Schmölz, "Kirche und Demokratie," Die neue Ordnung 6 (1963), 401–15; W. A. Purdy, Die Politik der katholischen Kirche (Gütersloh 1967); A. Langner, Die politische Gemeinschaft (Cologne 1968); H. Maier, Der Christ in der Demokratie (Augsburg 1968); A. Gnägi, Katholische Kirche und Demokratie (Zurich, Einsiedeln and Cologne 1970); Demokratie—Kirche—Politische Ethik (Jahrbuch für Christliche Sozialwissenschaften 10) (Münster 1971); H. Maier, Kirche und Gesellschaft (Munich 1973); M. Krämer, Kirche contra Demokratie? Gesellschaftliche Probleme im gegenwärtigen Katholizismus. Mit einem Geleitwort v. W. Dirks (Munich 1973); "Aufgaben der Kirche in Staat und Gesellschaft. Arbeitspapier der Sachkommission V der Gemeinsamen Synode der Bistümer in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland," Synode. Amtliche Mitteilungen der Gemeinsamen Synode der Bistümer in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland 1 (1973), 45–64.

THE CHURCH AND CONTEMPORARY SOCIAL ERRORS: (a) Socialism—Communism: G. Gundlach, S.J., "Sozialismus," Staatslexikon 4 (1931), 1688–95; E. Welty, O.P., "Christlicher Sozialismus," Die neue Ordnung 1 (1946/47), 39ff,; G. Gundlach, S.J., "Das Heilige Offizium und der Kommunismus," StdZ 144(1948/49), 451ff.; J. Höffner, "Sozialismus und Christentum," TThZ 57 (1948), 358ff. (literature); O. v. Nell-Breuning, S.J., "Sozialismus," Wörterbuch der Politik 5/2 (1951), 377–430; H. Falk, Kirche und Kommunismus. Der dialektische Materialismus und seine Verurteilung. (Düsseldorf 1956); K. Forster, ed., Christentum und demokratischer Sozialismus (Munich 1958); Der Katholik und die SPD, ed. by the SPD (Bonn 1959); G. E. Kafka, Der freiheitliche Sozialismus in Deutschland. Das Godesberger Programm der SPD in katholischer Sicht (Paderborn 1960); Katholik und Godesberger Programm. Zur Situation nach Mater et Magistra, ed. by the SPD (Bonn 1962); G. Stavenhagen and J. Höffner, "Sozialismus," Staatslexikon 7 (1962), 303–24; M. Stöhr, ed., Disputation zwischen Christen und Marxisten (Munich 1966); O. v. Nell-Breuning, S.J., "Sozialismus," Sacramentum Mundi IV (1969), 613–19; M. Spieker, Neomarxismus und Christentum. Zur Problematik des Dialogs (Paderborn 1974); F. Klüber, Katholische Soziallehre und demokratischer Sozialismus (Bonn and Bad Godesberg 1974).

(b) Fascism—National Socialism: E. v. Beckerath, Wesen und Werden des faschistischen Staates (Berlin 1927); A. Mirgeler, "Der Faschismus in der Geschichte des modernen Staates. Die Selbstdeutung Mussolinis und seiner Mitarbeiter," Saeculum 6 (1955), 84ff.; id., "Faschismus," Staatslexikon 3 (1959), 223–31; H. Buchheim, Totalitäre Herrschaft (Munich 1962); W. Schieder, "Faschismus," SDG 2 (Freiburg 1968), 438–77; E. Nolte, Die faschistischen Bewegungen, ed. by M. Broszat and H. Heiler, Vol. 3 (1973); G. Schulz, Faschismus—Nationalsozialismus. Versionen und theoretische Kontroversen 1922–1972 (Frankfurt 1974); W. Wippermann, Faschismustheorien. Zum Stand der gegenwärtigen Diskussion (Darmstadt 1975); D. Albrecht, "Zum Begriff des Totalitarismus," GWU 26 (1975), 135–41; H. A. Turner, Jr., ed., Reappraisals of Fascism (New York 1975); R. de Felice, Intervista sul fascismo (Bari 1975); K. D. Bracher, Zeitgeschichtliche Kontroversen. Um Faschismus, Totalitarismus, Demokratie (Munich 1976); H. U. Thamer and W. Wippermann, Faschistische und neofaschistische Bewegungen. Probleme empirischer Faschismusforschung (Darmstadt 1977); K. Buchheim, et. al., "Nationalsozialismus," Staatslexikon 5 (1960), 905–23; B. Stasiewski, Akten deutscher Bischöfe über die Lage der Kirche 1933–1945 1: 1933–1934 (Mainz 1968); 2: 1934–35 (Mainz 1976); 3: 1935–36 (Mainz 1978); K. Gotto, "Katholische Kirche und Nationalsozialismus," Staatslexikon 10 (1970); H. Mommsen, "Nationalsozialismus," SDG 4 (1971); H. Boberach, Berichte des SD und der Gestapo über Kirchen und Kirchenvolk in Deutschland 1934–44 (Mainz 1971); K. D. Erdmann, "Nationalsozialismus—Faschismus—Totalitarismus," GWU 27 (1976), 457–69; D. Albrecht, ed., Katholische Kirche im Dritten Reich (Mainz 1976).

THE FAMILY OF MAN: "WORLD STATE": J. Sonder, Die Idee der Völkergemeinschaft und die philosophischen Grundlagen des Völkerrechts (Frankfurt 1955); P. Heintz, ed., Soziologie der Entwicklungsländer (Cologne 1962); H. Krauss, S.J., Die Entwicklungsenzyklika Papst Pauls VI. "Populorum progressio" (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1967); J. Schmauch, Herrschen oder Helfen? Kritische Überlegungen zur Entwicklungshilfe (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1967); E. O. Czempiel, "Die Christen und die Auswärtige Politik. Lehre vom gerechten Krieg oder Praxeologie des Friedens?" Civitas 6 (1967), 20ff.; J. Bopp, Populorum progressio—Aufbruch der Kirche? (Stuttgart 1968); Römische Bischofssynode 1971: Gerechtigkeit in der Welt, ed. by the German Bishops' Conference; Der priesterliche Dienst—Gerechtigkeit in der Welt ed. by K. Hemmerle und W. Weber (Trier 1972) 71ff.; A. Weidert, Elemente einer theologischen Konflikt- und Friedenstheorie. Traditionskritische, biblische und hermeneutische Überlegungen zum Problem des Friedens (diss., Münster in Westphalia 1973).

8. Main Lines of the Development of Theology between the First World War and the Second Vatican Council

BIBLIOGRAPHY

The works listed below have of necessity been limited to the general line of development. For dates and specific developments see: A. Kolping, Katholische Theologie gestern und heute. Thematik und Entfaltung deutscher Katholischer Theologie, vom I.Vaticanum bis zur Gegenwart (Bremen 1964); H. Vorgrimler and R. Vander Gucht eds., Bilanz der Theologie im 20.Jh. I–IV (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1969–70). For the period immediately before and after the Second Vatican Council see among others: G. Thils, Orientations de la théologie (Louvain 1958); A. H. Maltha, Die neue Theologie (Munich 1960); E. O. Brien, Theology in Transition (New York 1965); E. Menard, Kirche gestern und morgen (Frankfurt 1968); M. Schoof, Der Durchbruch der neuen katholischen Theologie. Ursprünge—Wege—Strukturen (Vienna, Freiburg and Basel 1969); Y. Congar, Theology in Service of God's People (New York 1972); G. A. Gutierrez, A Theology of Liberation (New York 1973).

9. Movements within the Church and their Spirituality

LITERATURE

LITURGICAL MOVEMENT: O. Rousseau, Histoire du mouvement liturgique (Paris 1945); A. Mayer-Pfannholz, "Das Kirchenbild des 19. Jahrhunderts und seine Ablösung," Die Besinnung 3 (1948), 124–44; A. L. Mayer, "Die Stellung der Liturgie von der Zeit der Romantik bis zur Jahrhundertwende," ALW III/1 (1953), 1–77; id., "Die geistesgeschichtliche Situation der liturgischen Erneuerung in der Gegenwart," ALW IV/1 (1955), 1–51; E. Iserloh, "Die Geschichte der Liturgischen Bewegung," Hirschberg 12 (1959), 113–22; B. Fischer, "Das 'Mechelner Ereignis' vom 23.9.1909," LJ 9 (1959), 203–19; J. Wagner, LThK VI (1961), 1097–1100; F. Kolbe, Die Liturgische Bewegung (Aschaffenburg 1964); L. Bouyer, Don Lambert Beauduin. Un homme d'Église (Tournai 1964); F. Henrich, Die Bünde katholischer Jugendbewegung. Ihre Bedeutung für die liturgische und eucharistische Erneuerung (Munich 1968); T. Maas-Ewerd, Die Krise der liturgischen Bewegung in Deutschland (Regensburg 1977).

CATHOLIC ACTION: E. Schlund, Die Katholische Aktion, Materialien und Akten (Munich 1928); F. Magri, L'Azione Cattolica in Italia, 2 vols. (Milan 1953); K. Rahner, "Über das Laienapostolat," Schriften zur Theologie II (Einsiedeln 1955), 339–73; Y. Congar, Der Laie (Stuttgart 1957); L. Tromp, De laicorum apostolatus fundamento, indole, formis (Rome 1957); F. Klostermann, Das christliche Apostolat (Innsbruck 1962); id., "Katholische Aktion," Sacramentum Mundi II, 1070–78.

EUCHARISTIC PIETY: J. A. Jungmann, "Eucharistiefeier und Frömmigkeit," LJ 5 (1955), 96–104; id., "Corpus mysticum. Gedanken zum kommenden Eucharistischen Weltkongreß," StdZ 164 (1958/59), 401–9; F. Hofmann, "Eucharistie und Frömmigkeit," LJ 5 (1955), 105–19; H. Fischer, Eucharistiekatechese und Liturgische Erneuerung. Rückblick und Wegweisung (Düsseldorf 1959); Statio Orbis. Eucharistischer Weltkongreß 1960 in München, 2 vols. (Munich 1960) J. Ratzinger, "Der Eucharistische Weltkongreß im Spiegel der Kritik," Statio Orbis I, 227–42; R. Aubert, "Die Eucharistischen Kongresse von Leo XIII. bis Johannes XXIII.," Concilium 1 (1965), 61–66.

DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART: A. Hamon, Histoire de la dévotion au Sacré Cœur, 5 vols. (Paris 1923–39); H. Rahner, "Grundzüge einer Geschichte der Herz-Jesu-Verehrung," ZAM 15 (1943), 61–83; R. Graber, Das Herz des Erlösers (Innsbruck 1949); J. Stierli et al., eds., Cor Salvatoris. Wege zur Herz-Verehrung (Freiburg 1954); A. Bea and H. Rahner et al., eds., Cor Jesu, 2 vols. (Rome 1959); R. Graber, Die Herz-Jesu-Verehrung in der Krise der Gegenwart (Eichstätt 1962).

MARIAN DEVOTION: H. M. Köster, Die Magd des Herrn. Theologische Versuche und Überlegungen (Limburg 1947); P. Sträter, ed., Katholische Marienkunde I–III (Paderborn 1947–51); K. Rahner, "Probleme heutiger Mariologie," Aus der Theologie der Zeit (Regensburg 1948); O. Semmelroth, Urbild der Kirche. Organischer Aufbau des Mariengeheimnisses (Würzburg 1950); R. Graber, ed., Die marianischen Weltrundschreiben der Päpste in den letzten hundert Jahren (Würzburg 1951); O. Semmelroth, Maria oder Christus? (Frankfurt 1954); C. Feckes, ed., Die heilsgeschichtliche Stellvertretung der Menschheit durch Maria (Paderborn 1954); M. de S. Pierre, Bernadette. Die wahre Geschichte von Lourdes (Freiburg 1954); H. Peichl, ed., Maria im Lichte der Glaubenswissenschaft (Munich 1955); J. Goubert and L. Cristiani, Marienerscheinungen (Recklinghausen 1955); K. Rahner, Maria. Mutter des Herrn (Freiburg 1956); P. Sträter, Maria im Reiche Christi (Paderborn 1958); A. Müller, "Fragen und Aussichten der heutigen Mariologie," Fragen der Theologie heute (Einsiedeln 1958), 301–17; Mariologische Studien, ed. by the Deutsche Arbeitsgemeinschaft für Mariologie, I–III, 1962–64; R. Rusch, "Mariologische Wertungen," ZKTh 85 (1963), 129–61; H. Graef, Maria. Eine Geschichte der Lehre und Verehrung (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1964); R. Laurentin, Die marianische Frage (Freiburg 1965); W. Beinert, Heute von Maria reden? (Freiburg 1973); id., ed., Maria heute ehren. Eine theologisch-pastorale Handreichung (Freiburg 1977). M. Schmaus, Kath. Dogmatik V (Munich 1961).

SECULAR INSTITUTES: H. U. v. Balthasar, Der Laie und der Ordensstand (Freiburg 1949); J. Zürcher, Päpstliche Dokumente zur Ordensreform (Einsiedeln 1954); R. Voillaume, Mitten in der Welt. Das Leben der Kleinen Brüder von Pater de Foucauld (Freiburg 1956); J. Beyer, ed., De institutis saecularibus. Documenta (Rome 1962); J. Kerkhofs, "Aspects sociologiques du sacerdoce," NRTh 82 (1960), 289–99; H. A. Timmermann, Die Weltgemeinschaften im deutschen Sprachraum (Einsiedeln 1963); J. Beyer, Als Laie Gott geweiht (Einsiedeln 1964); A. Wienand, ed., Das Wirken der Orden und Klöster in Deutschland, 2 vols. (Cologne 1964); "Opus Dei"—Für und Wider (Osnabrück 1967); W. Menges, Die Ordensmänner in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (Cologne 1969); R. Hostie, Vie et mort des ordres religieux (Paris 1972); A. Menningen, Christ in welthafter Existenz. Die theol. Grundlagen der Säkularinstitute Schönstatts (Vallendar 1968).

WORKER-PRIESTS: H. Perrin, Tagebuch eines Arbeiterpriesters, Journal d'un prêtre ouvrier en Allemagne (Paris 1945); A. Dansette, Destin du catholicisme français, 1926–1956 (Paris 1957); A. Collonge, Le scandale du XX^e siècle et le drâme des prêtres ouvriers (Paris 1957); M. R. (Jacques) Loew, Journal d'une mission ouvrière 1941–1959 (Paris 1959); G. Siefer, Die Mission der Arbeiterpriester (1960); Les prêtres ouvriers (Paris 1954).

10. Developments in the Clergy since 1914

SOURCES

Sacerdotis imago. Päpstliche Dokumente über das Priestertum von Pius X. bis Johannes XXIII., ed. by A. Rohrbasser (Fribourg 1962); "Decretum de Institutione Sacerdotali 'Optatam totius' = Dekret über die Ausbildung der Priester," Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil. Konstitutionen, Dekrete und Erklärungen 2 (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1967), 309–55; "Decretum de Presbyterorum Ministerio 'Presbyterorum Ordinis' = Dekret über Dienst und Leben der Priester," ibid. 3 (1968), 127–239; "Litterae Encyclicae 'Sacerdotalis Caelibatus' d.d. 24. 6. 1967," AAS 59 (1967), 657–97; "Documenta Synodi Episcoporum: De Sacerdotio Ministeriali," AAS 63 (1971), 898–922; "Sacra Congregatio pro Institutione Catholica: Ratio Fundamentalis Institutionis Sacerdotalis," AAS 62 (1970), 321–84; Schreiben der deutschen Bischöfe über das priesterliche Amt. Eine biblisch-dogmatische Handreichung (Trier 1969); "Die pastoralen Dienste in der Gemeinde," Gemeinsame Synode der Bistümer in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. Beschlüsse der Vollversammlung 1 (Freiburg 1976), 581–636; The proceedings: Protokoll der 5. Vollversammlung, 22–26. Mai 1974, 136–85; Protokoll der 7. Vollversammlung, 7.–11. Mai 1975, 131–51.

LITERATURE

For the role of the priest in the Youth Movement see Youth Movement: A. Klönne, "Eine Literatur-Übersicht zur Geschichte der Jugendbewegung," Recht der Jugend 2 (Berlin 1954), 254f.; O. Köhler, LThK 5 (1960), 1181f.—On the Worker-Priests in France: H. Perrin, Journal d'un prêtre ouvrier en Allemagne (Paris 1945); G. Siefer, Die Mission der Arbeiterpriester (Essen 1960); R. Ludmann, LThK 1 (1957), 811ff.

For a Discussion of the Role of the Priest since Vatican II: F. Klostermann, Priester für morgen (Innsbruck 1970); N. Glatzel, "Die Rolle des Priesters in der Leistungsgesellschaft," Jahrbuch für christliche Sozialwissenschaften 12 (1971), 163–83; id., "Soziologische Aspekte der Seelsorgerrole," StdZ 187 (1971), 31–42; H. Küng, Wozu Priester? Eine Hilfe (Zurich, Einsiedeln and Cologne 1971); J. Höffner, Der Priester in der permissiven Gesellschaft (Cologne 1971): H. Volk, "Priestertum heute," Internat. Kath. Zeitschrift 1 (1972), 498–517, 2 (1973), 45–58; H. Schlier, "Grundelemente des priesterlichen Amtes im Neuen Testament," Theologie und Philosophie 44 (1969), 161–80; O. Semmelroth, S.J., "Die Präsenz der drei Ämter Christi im gemeinsamen und besonderen Priestertum der Kirche," ibid., 181–95; J. Pieper, "Was unterscheidet den Priester?" Hochland 63 (1971), 1–16; Reform und Anerkennung kirchlicher Ämter. Ein Memorandum der Arbeitsgemeinschaft ökumenischer Universitätsinstitute (Munich and Mainz 1973); K. H. Schuh, ed., Amt im Widerstreit (Berlin 1973); G. Siefer, Sterben die Priester aus? Soziologische Überlegungen zum Funktionswandel eines Berufsstandes (Essen 1973); F. Luthe, Berufswechsel der Priester. Eine empirische Studie (Düsseldorf 1970).

For a Discussion of Priestly Celibacy: E. Schillebeeckx, O.P., Der Amtszölibat. Eine Kritische Besinnung (Düsseldorf 1967); K. Rahner, S.J., "Der Zölibat des Weltpriesters im heutigen Gespräch," Geist und Leben 40 (1967), 122–38; F. Böckle, ed., Der Zölibat. Erfahrungen, Meinungen, Vorschläge (Mainz 1968); K. Kraemer and K. H. Schuh, eds., Zölibat in der Diskussion. Katholische und evangelische Aspekte (Essen 1969); J. Coppens, ed., Sacerdoce et Célibat. Études historiques et théologiques (Louvain 1971).—On Priest Organizations and Conferences: A. Schilling, ed., SOG-Papiere. Mitteilungsblatt der Arbeitsgemeinschaft von Priestergruppen in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland und der SOG-Österreich, (Bochum 1968–73); Imprimatur. Nachrichten und kritische Meinungen aus der (Trierer) katholischen Kirche (Trier 1968–75); C. Holenstein, ed., Churer Dokumente. Bischofs-Symposion 7. bis 10. Juli 1969. Texte der Bischöfe und Priester im Wortlaut (Zurich 1969); M. Raske, K. Schäfer, and N. Wetzel, eds., Eine freie Kirche für eine freie Welt. Delegiertenkonferenz europäischer Priestergruppen Rom 10. bis 16. Oktober 1969. Eine Dokumentation (Düsseldorf 1969); C. Holenstein, Der Protest der Priester (Zurich, Einsiedeln and Cologne 1970); K. Schäfer, "Zum Thema Priestergruppen," StdZ 185 (1970), 34–46; id., "Nochmals: Zum Thema Priestergruppen," ibid. 185 (1970), 361–78; K. Rahner, S.J., "Chancen der Priestergruppen," ibid. 185 (1970), 172–80; H. Werners, "Priestergruppen—Konzeption und Erfahrung," Jahrbuch für christliche Sozialwissenschaften 12 (1971), 185–204.

On Surveys of Priests: O. Schreuder, ed., Der alarmierende Trend. Ergebnisse einer Umfrage beim gesamten holländischen Klerus (Munich and Mainz 1970); G. Schmidtchen, Priester in Deutschland. Forschungsbericht über die im Auftrag der Deutschen Bischofskonferenz durchgeführte Umfrage unter allen Welt- und Ordenspriestern in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. In Verbindung mit dem Institut für Demoskopie Allensbach (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1973); K. Forster, ed., Priester zwischen Anpassung und Unterscheidung. Auswertung und Dommentare zu der im Auftrag der Deutschen Bischofskonferenz durchgeführten Umfrage unter allen Welt- und Ordenspriestern in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1974), esp: O. Simmel, S.J., "Vergleich der deutschen Umfrageergebnisse mit den Ergebnissen der Priesterbefragungen in Österreich, in der Schweiz, in Spanien, in den USA und in Italien," pp. 127–248; P. M. Zulehner and S. R. Graupe, Wie Priester heute leben. . . . , Ergebnisse der Wiener Priesterbefragung (Vienna, Freiburg and Basel 1970); P. M. Zulehner, ed., Kirche und Priester zwischen dem Auftrag Jesu und den Erwartungen der Menschen. Ergebnisse der Umfragen des Instituts für kirchliche Sozialforschung Wien über "Religion und Kirche in Österreich" und "Priester in Österreich" (Vienna, Freiburg and Basel 1974); A. Müller, Priester—Randfigur der Gesellschaft? Befund und Deutung der Schweizer Priesterumfrage (Zurich, Einsiedeln and Cologne 1974).

ON THE REFORM OF PRIESTLY EDUCATION AND THEOLOGICAL STUDIES: L. Waltermann, ed., Klerus zwischen Wisenschaft und Seelsorge. Zur Reform der Priesterausbildung. Beiträge im Westdeutschen Rundfunk (Essen 1966); SKT = Studium Katholische Theologie. Berichte—Analysen—Vorschläge, ed. by the Kommission "Curricula in Theologie" des Westdeutschen Fakultätentages and E. Feifel, booklets 1–5, (Zurich, Einsiedeln and Cologne 1973–75); A. Arens, "Einleitung und Kommentar zur Ratio Fundamentalis," A. Arens and H. Schmitz, eds., Priesterausbildung und Theologiestudium (Trier 1974), 5–67; G. Schmidtchen, *Umfrage unter Priesteramtskandidaten. Studien-und Lebenssituation, Amtsverständnis, Berufsmotive, Einstellung zu Kirche und Gesellschaft. Forschungsbericht des Instituts für Demoskopie Allensbach über eine im Auftrag der Deutschen Bischofskonferenz durchgeführte Erhebung (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1975).

11. Religious Communities and Secular Institutes

LITERATURE

On papal and episcopal laws concerning the orders, see Dizionario degli Instituti di Perfezione (DIP), ed. by G. Pelliccia and G. Rocca, of which three volumes (covering A to Conv.) have appeared (Vol. I, 1974; II, 1975; III, 1976); K. S. Frank, Grundzüge der Geschichte des christlichen Mönchtums (Darmstadt 1975), 175–95.

12. Educational System, Education, and Instruction

BIBLIOGRAPHY

K. Erlinghagen, Grundlagen katholischer Erziehung. Die prinzipiellen Erziehungslehren der Enzyklika Pius' XI. "Divini Illius Magistri" (Freiburg 1963); O. Betz, "Erziehung," H. Fries, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe 1 (Munich 1962) 319ff.; A. v. Campenhausen, Erziehungsauftrag und staatliche Schulträgerschaft (Göttingen 1967), 115ff.; N.A. Luyten, O.P. Forschung und Bildung. Aufgaben einer katholischen Universität (Fribourg 1965).

CATHOLIC EDUCATION IN VARIOUS COUNTRIES: Germany: F. Paulsen, Geschichte des gelehrten Unterrichts, 2 vols. (Berlin and Leipzig 1921); E. Weniger, "Bildungswesen," Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 1 (Tübingen 1957), 1281 ff.; F. Pöggeler, ed., Handbuch der Erwachsenenbildung 4 (Stuttgart 1975); L. Froese, ed., Deutsche Schulgesetzgebung (1796–1952) (Weinheim, n.d.).

Other European States: W. Schultze, ed., Schulen in Europa, 3 vols. (Weinheim and Berlin 1968); O. Anweiler, Geschichte der Schule und Pädagogik in Rußland vom Ende des Zarenreiches bis zum Beginn der Stalin-Ära (Heidelberg 1964).

General Sources: See New Catholic Encyclopedia under education and various universities; F. Laack, Die amerikanische Bildungswirklichkeit, Idee, Stand und Probleme der Adult Education in den USA (Cologne 1976); Thomas J. La Belle, ed., Education and Development: Latin America and the Caribbean (Los Angeles 1972); William O. Smith, Education in Great Britain (New York 1967); Robert Ulich, Education in Western Culture (New York 1965); I. Illich, Education and the Rise of the Corporate State (New York 1973); Frank P. Graves, History of Education in Modern Times (New York 1915); Adolph E. Meyer, The Development of Education in the Twentieth Century (New York 1939); G. A. N. Lowndes, The Silent Social Revolution (New York 1937); A. Prost, L'Enseignement en France, 1800–1967 (Paris 1968); Howard C. Barnard, Short History of English Education (Great Britain 1947); Raymond Williams, Culture and Society, 1780–1950 (New York 1958).

Mission Lands: A. Mulders, Missionsgeschichte. Die Ausbreitung des Glaubens (Regensburg 1960); S. Delacroix, Histoire Universelle Des Missions Catholiques 4 (Paris 1959).

Statistical Aids: UNESCO, World Survey of Education, 5 vols. (Paris 1955–71); UNESCO, Statistical Yearbook (Paris 1963) (1952–62: Basic Facts and Figures, International Statistics Relating to Education, Culture and Mass Communication); Bilan du Monde; CIEO, The Situation of Catholic Education in the Various Continents (Brussels 1969).

13. Information and the Mass Media

SOURCES

"Inter mirifica, Dekret des Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzils über die Instrumente der sozialen Kommunikation (vom 4. 12. 1963)," LThK—Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil I (Freiburg i. Brsg.), 116–35; Communio et Progressio. Pastoralinstruktion über die Instrumente der sozialen Kommunikation vom 23. 5. 1971, Nachkonziliare Dokumentation 11 (Trier 1971); Radio Vaticana, ed., Documenti Pontifici sulla Radio e sulla Televisione 1929–1962 (Rome and Vatican City 1962); Documenti Pontifici sulla stampa (1878–1963) (Rome and Vatican City); Documenti Pontifici sul Teatro (341–1966) (Rome and Vatican City 1966).—Bibliographical References to Papal Attitudes toward Publications in Recent History: (1.) Pius XII: W. Hamerski, "Reden Papst Pius' XII. zu Fragen der Publizistik," Publizistik 8 (1963), 611–31. (2.) John XXIII: G. Deussen, "Publizistisch relevante Äußerungen Papst Johannes' XXIII. im chronologischen Überblick," Communicatio Socialis, CS 6 (1973), 294–96. (3.) Paul VI.: "Die publizistisch relevanten Äußerungen Papst Pauls VI. im chronologischen Überblick," G. Deussen, Ethik der Massenkommunikation bei Papst Paul VI. (Paderborn 1973), 328–37.

LITERATURE

International: R. Aguiló, ed., Catholic Media World Directory (Rome 1971); Istituto Cattolico per la Stampa, ed., La Stampa Cattolica nel Mondo (Milan 1939); K. Richter, ed., Katholische Presse in Europa (Osnabrück 1969), "L'opinion publique dan l'Eglise (9^{e} Congrès mondial de l'Union Catholique Internationale de la Presse), Actes du congrès, 1^{ere}–3^{e} partie," Journalistes Catholiques, nos. 58–61, July–December 1971 (Paris); G. Ernst and B. Marschall, eds., Film und Rundfunk. Zweiter internationaler Katholischer Filmkongreß, Erster Internationaler Katholischer Rundfunkkongreß, Gesamtbericht (Munich 1929); C. Ford, Le Cinéma au service de la foi (Paris 1953).

Third World–Missions (Bibliography): W. Herzog, Church and Communication in Developing Countries (Paderborn 1973); F. J. Eilers, Christliche Publizistik in Afrika (St. Augustin 1964); F. J. Eilers and W. Herzog, Catholic Press Directory Africa/Asia (Paderborn 1975); J. Schmidt, Massenmedien als Instrumente der Mission (diss., Heidelberg 1974).

Germany: K. Löffler, Geschichte der katholischen Presse Deutschlands (Mönchen-Gladbach 1924); W. Kisky, Der Augustinus-Verein zur Pflege der Katholischen Presse von 1878 bis 1928. (Düsseldorf 1928); J. W. Naumann, ed., Die Presse und der Katholik (Augsburg 1932); M. Hüsgen, Die Bistumsblätter in Niedersachsen während der nationalsozialistischen Zeit (Hildesheim 1975), a survey of previous research on the problem of Catholic publications in the Nazi period; M. Schmolke, Die schlechte Presse. Katholiken und Publizistik zwischen "Katholik" und "Publik" 1821–1968 (Münster in Westphalia 1971); G. Bauer, Kirchliche Rundfunkarbeit 1924–1939 (Frankfurt am Main 1966).

France: G. Hourdin, La Presse Catholique (Paris 1957); J. Godfrin and N. Godfrin, Une Centrale de la Presse Catholique: La Maison de la Bonne Presse et ses Publications (Paris 1965).

Netherlands: G. W. Marsman, De Katholieke Dagbladpers in sociologisch perspectief (Assen 1967); J. Jemels and M. Schmolke, Katholische Publizistik in den Niederlanden (Paderborn 1977).

Austria: K. M. Stepan, Stückwerk im Spiegel (Graz and Vienna 1949); F. Funder, Vom Gestern ins Heute (Vienna 1952).—Switzerland: F. P. Schaller, Notstand im christlichen Pressewesen (Einsiedeln and Zurich 1974).

United States: M. L. Reilly, A History of The Catholic Press Association 1911–1968 (Metuchen, N.J. 1971). Martin Marty et. al., The Religious Press in America (New York 1963).

14. Charity and Ecclesiastical Works of Assistance

SOURCES

There is no basic collection of sources. In addition to numerous and often unpublished reports, the following are important: Zeitschrift Caritas (Freiburg 1896ff.); The Catholic Charities Review (Washington 1916ff.); Caritas Internationalis. Annuarium (Rome 1965ff.).

LITERATURE

Jahrbuch des Caritasverbandes 1–11 (Freiburg 1907–17);Jahrbuch der Caritaswissenschaft (Freiburg 1925–38):Jahrbuch für Caritaswissenschaft und Caritasarbeit (Freiburg 1957–68); Caritas '68ff. Jahrbuch des DCV (Freiburg 1968ff.); W. Liese, Wohlfahrtspflege und Caritas im Deutschen Reich, in Deutsch-Österreich, der Schweiz und Luxemburg (Mönchen-Gladbach 1914); id., Lorenz Werthmann und der Deutsche Caritasverband (Freiburg 1929); A. Foucault,Histoire de la Société de S. Vincent de Paul (Paris 1933); An der Aufgabe gewachsen. Vom Werden und Wirken des Deutschen Caritasverbandes, ed. by Zentralvorstand (Freiburg 1957); H. H. Havemann and W. Kraus, eds.,Handbuch der Entwicklungshilfe. Fortsetzungswerk in Loseblattform (Baden-Baden 159ff.); H. Besters and E. E. Boesch, eds., Entwicklungspolitik. Handbuch und Lexikon (Stuttgart, Berlin and Mainz 1966); R. Völkl, Dienende Kirche—Kirche der Liebe (Freiburg 1969); E. Gatz, Kirche und Krankenpflege im 19. Jahrhundert (Paderborn 1971); A. Rinken, Das Öffentliche als verfassungstheoretisches Problem—dargestellt am Rechtsstatus der Wohlfahrtsverbände (Berlin 1971); 1897–1972. 75 Jahre Deutscher Caritasverband, ed. by Deutscher Caritasverband Freiburg (Freiburg 1972); J. Krautscheidt and H. Marré, eds., Essener Gespräche zum Thema Staat und Kirche 8 (Münster 1974).

15. History of the Ecumenical Movement

LITERATURE

H. L. Althaus, ed., Ökumenische Dokumente. Quellenstücke über die Einheit der Kirche (Göttingen 1962); R. Rouse and S. C. Neill, Geschichte der ökumenischen Bewegung 1517–1948 1–2 (Göttingen 1957–58); E. Fey and G. Gaßmann, eds., Geschichte der ökumenischen Bewegung 1948–1968 (Göttingen 1974); F. Biot, Von der Polemik zum Dialog (Vienna and Munich 1966); G. H Tavard, Geschichte der ökumenischen Bewegung (Mainz 1964); R. Frieling, Die Bewegung für Glauben und Kirchenverfassung 1910–1937 (Göttingen 1970); A. Deißmann, ed., Die Stockholmer Weltkirchenkonferenz. Amtlicher deutscher Bericht (Berlin 1926); F. Lüpsen, ed., Amsterdamer Dokumente (Bethel 1948); id., ed., Evanston—Dokumente (Witten 1954); id., ed., Neu Delhi—Dokumente (Witten 1962); N. Goodall, ed., Bericht aus Uppsala 1968 (Geneva 1968); R. Groscurth, ed., Von Uppsala nach Nairobi—Ökumenische Bilanz 1968–1975 (Bielefeld and Frankfurt 1975); H. Krüger and W. Müller-Römheld, eds., Bericht aus Nairobi. Offizieller Bericht der 5. Vollversammlung des ÖRK 1975 (Frankfurt 1976); A. Boyens, Kirchenkampf und

Ökumene 1933–1939 (Munich 1969); id., Kirchenkampf und Ökumene 1939–1945 (Munich 1973); G. Gloede, ed., Ökumenische Profile, Brückenbauer der Einheit der Kirche, 2 vols. (Stuttgart 1961–63); M. Pribilla, Von der kirchlichen Einheit (Freiburg 1929); R. Aubert, Le Saint-Siège et l'Union des Églises (Brussels 1947); L. Jaeger, Das Konzilsdekret "Über den Ökumenismus" (Paderborn 1968); P. Bratsiotis, ed., Die orthodoxe Kirche in griechischer Sicht 1–2 (1959–60); S. Harkianakis, "Über die gegenwärtige Situation der orthodoxen Kirche," Kyrios 6 (1966), 227–39; J. Meyendorf, Die orthodoxe Kirche gestern und heute (Salzburg 1963); S. V. Stavridis, Geschichte des Ökumenischen Patriarchats (1967); N. Ehrenström and G. Gaßmann, Confessions in Dialogue. A Survey of Bilateral Conversations Among World Confessional Families 1959–1974 (Geneva 1975); V. Pfnür, Kirche und Amt. Neuere Literatur zur ökumenischen Diskussion um die Amtsfrage (Münster 1975), 22–32; G. Gaßmann, M. Lienhard, H. Meyer and H. V. Herntrich, eds., Um Amt und Herrenmahl. Dokumentation zum evangelisch römisch-katholischen Gespräch (Frankfurt 1974).

16. The Dissident Eastern Churches

LITERATURE

J. Tyciak, G. Wunderle and P. Werhun, eds., Der christliche Osten. Geist und Gestalt (Regensburg 1939); J. Casper, "Die orientalische Christenheit," Christus und die Religionen der Erde. Hdb. der Religionsgeschichte III, F. König, ed. (Freiburg 1951), 643–729; W. de Vries, Der christliche Osten in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Würzburg 1951); R. Janin, "Les Églises orientales," C. Poulet, Histoire du christianisme. Époque contemporaine (Paris 1957), 489–545; J. Gründler, Lexikon der christlichen Kirchen und Sekten unter Berücksichtigung der Missionsgesellschaften und zwischenkirchlichen Organisationen, 2 vols. (Vienna, Freiburg and Basel 1961); D. Attwater, The Christian Churches of the East, 2 vols. (Milwaukee 1961–62); J. Chrysostomus, "Ostkirche," Hbd. theologischer Grundbegriffe II, ed. by H. Fries (Munich 1963), 256–66; B. Stasiewski, "Geschichtliche Überlegungen zur kirchlichen Trennung zwischen Orient und Okzident," Das Christentum des Ostens und die christliche Einheit (Würzburg 1965), 13–40; R. Goosmann, Die Ostkirchen (Männedorf, Switz. 1966); B. Spuler, Gegenwartslage der Ostkirchen in ihrer nationalen und staatlichen Umwelt (Frankfurt am Main 1968); M. Lehmann, Leitfaden der Ostkirchen (Vienna 1969); F. Heiler, Die Ostkirchen (Munich and Basel 1971); E. v. Ivánka, J. Tyciak and P. Wiertz, eds., Hbd. der Ostkirchenkunde (Düsseldorf 1971); J. Madey, Die Kirchen des Ostens. Eine kleine Einführung (Freiburg i. Ue. 1972); A. W. Ziegler, Das Verhältnis von Kirche und Staat in Europa II (Munich 1972); B. Spuler, "Die morgenländischen Kirchen seit 1965," Kirche im Osten 16 (1973), 158–74; Oriente Cattolico. Cinni storici e statistiche (Vatican City 1974).

THE ORTHODOX CHURCHES: A. M. Ammann, Abriß der ostslawischen Kirchengeschichte (Vienna 1950); G. Zananiri, Histoire de l'Église byzantine (Paris 1954); P. Bratsiotis, ed., Die orthodoxe Kirche in griechischer Sicht, 2 vols. (Stuttgart 1959–60); A. Attwater, op. cit. II, 6–160; K. Onasch, Einführung in die Konfessionskunde der orthodoxen Kirchen (Berlin 1962); B. Spuler, "Die Orthodoxie," Weltgeschichte der Gegenwart II (Berne and Munich 1963), 552–67; id., Gegenwartslage der Ostkirchen, 17–258; M. Lacko and P. Chrysostomus, "Geschichte und jetziger Stand der orthodoxen Kirchen," K. Algermissen, Konfessionskunde (Paderborn 1969), 171–202; F. Heiler, op. cit., 39–301; S. Runciman, The Orthodox Churches and the Secular State (Oxford 1971); P. Leisching, Kirche und Staat in den Rechtsordnungen Europas. Ein Überblick (Freiburg 1973); P. Meinhold "Das Orthodoxe Christentum," Saeculum Weltgeschichte VII (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1975), 296–306; N. Thon, ed., "Die orthodoxen Kirchen in Geschichte und Gegenwart," Königsteiner Studien (Königstein im Taunus 1975), 129–60; A. Proc, ed., Jahrbuch der Orthodoxie. Schematismus 1976/77 (Munich 1977).

THE FOUR ANCIENT PATRIARCHATES: Ekklesia X: Die Orthodoxe Kirche auf dem Balkan und in Vorderasien, 46: Die orthodoxen Patriarchate von Konstantinopel, Alexandrien, Antiochien, Jerusalem und das Erzbistum von Cypern (Leipzig 1941); J. Hajjar, "Le Congrès général du Patriarcat orthodoxe d'Antioche," PrOrChr 6 (1956), 128–43; H. Engberding, "Das neue Grundgesetz des griechischen orthodoxen Patriarchats von Jerusalem," OrChr 43 (1959), 120–35; Mosconas, "Das griechisch-orthodoxe Patriarchat von Alexandrien," Kyrios n.s. 1 (1960/61), 129–39; C. Dahm, Die Kirche im Osten. Macht und Pracht der Patriarchen I (Offenburg 1964); F. W. Fernau, Patriarchen am Goldenen Horn. Gegenwart und Tradition des orthodoxen Orients (Opladen 1967); I. Doens, "L'Église orthodoxe en Afrique Orientale dans et hors le cadre du patriarcat grec orthodoxe d'Alexandrie," Revue du Clergé africain 24 (1969), 543–76; R. Potz, Patriarch und Synode in Konstantinopel. Das Verfassungsrecht des ökumenischen Patriarchates (Vienna 1971).

THE ORTHODOX CHURCH IN GEORGIA: M. Tarchnišili, "Die Entstehung und Entwicklung der kirchlichen Autokephalie Georgiens," Kyrios 5 (1940/41), 177–93; R. Janin, op. cit., 524–25; D. Attwater, see op. cit. II, 116–18; D. M. Lang, A Modern History of Georgia (London 1962); B. Spuler, Gegenwartslage der Ostkirchen, 224–28; R. Hotz, "Christen in Stalins Heimat. Die georgisch-orthodoxe Kirche," Digest des Ostens 15, no. 12 (Königstein in Taunus 1972), 35–39.

THE MEDIEVAL AND MORE RECENTLY CREATED PATRIARCHATES

THE ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF BULGARIA: M. Bulgarus, "Die heutige Lage der Bulgarischen Orthodoxen Kirche," Die christlichen Kirchen der Gegenwart (Munich and Basel 1950), 46–52; D. Slijepčević, Die bulgarische orthodoxe Kirche 1944–1956 (Munich 1957); S. Zankow, "Die Bulgarische Orthodoxe Kirche in Geschichte und Gegenwart," IKZ 48 (1958), 189–208; M. Zambonardi, La Chiesa autocefala bulgara (Rome 1960); P. L. Huillier, La religion en Bulgarie (Paris 1968); R. Stupperich, ed., Kirche und Staat in Bulgarien und Jugoslawien. Gesetze und Verordnungen in deutscher Übersetzung (Witten 1971), 5–15; T. P. Koev, "Patriarch Kiril zum Gedächtnis," Kirche im Osten 15 (1972), 11–16; W. Oschlies, "Kirche und Staat in Bulgarien," Informationsdienst des kath. Arbeitskreises für zeitgeschichtliche Fragen 72 (Bonn 1975), 63–69; id., "Kirche und Religion in Bulgarien," Kirche in Not 24 (Königstein im Taunus 1976), 110–16.

THE ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE OF SERBIA: D. Geißler, "Die Stellung der serbischen orthodoxen Kirche im Staatskirchenrecht Jugoslawiens," Jahrbuch des Osteuropainstitus zu Breslau 1940 (Wroclaw 1941), 203–10; T. Spaskij, "Die Lage der serbischen Kirche," Die christlichen Kirchen der Gegenwart (Munich and Basel 1950), 42–45; D. Slijepčević, "Die serbische Orthodoxie," IKZ 61 (1953), 151–76; B. Spuler, "Die serbisch-orthodoxe Kirche," Osteuropa-Hdb. Jugoslawien, ed. W. Markert (Cologne and Graz 1954), 185–87; F. Popan and C. Drašković, Orthodoxie heute in Rumänien und Jugoslawien. Religiöses Leben und theologische Bewegung (Vienna 1960); V. Pospischil, Der Patriarch in der serbisch-orthodoxen Kirche (Vienna 1966); R. Stupperich, Kirche und Staat in Bulgarien und Jugoslawien, 16–54; A. Rauch, "Kirchen- und Religionsgemeinschaften," Südosteuropa-Hdb. I, ed. K. D. Grothusen (Göttingen 1975), 345–59.

THE MOSCOW PATRIARCHATE: Die Russische Orthodoxe Kirche, ihre Einrichtungen, ihre Stellung, ihre Tätigkeit (Moscow 1958); W. de Vries, Kirche und Staat in der Sowjetunion (Munich 1959); A. Kischkowsky, Die sowjetische Religionspolitik und die Russische Orthodoxe Kirche (Munich 1960); B. Stasiewski, "Sowjetische Religionspolitik," Hochland 52 (1960), 315–24; W. Kolarz, Religion in the Soviet Union (London 1961); R. Stupperich, ed., Kirche und Staat in der Sowjetunion. Gesetze und Verordnungen (Witten 1962); B. Stasiewski, "Die Lage der christlichen Kirchen in der Sowjetunion," H. Ludat, ed., Sowjetunion, Werden und Gestalt einer Weltmacht (Gießen 1963), 259–80; J. Chrysostomus, Kirchengeschichte Rußlands der neuesten Zeit, 3 vols. (Munich and Salzburg 1965–68); N. Struve, Die Christen in der UdSSR (Mainz 1965); J. Chrysostomus, Kleine Kirchengeschichte Rußlands nach 1917 (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1968); M. Bordeaux, Patriarch and Prophets, Persecution of the Russian Orthodox Church Today (London 1970); W. C. Fletscher, The Russian Orthodox Church Underground 1917–1970 (London 1971); G. Codevilla, Stato e Chiesa nell'Unione Sovietica (Milan 1972); C. Dahm, Millionen in Rußland glauben an Gott II (Jestetten 1973); D. Konstantinow, Die Kirche in der Sowjetunion nach dem Kriege. Entfaltung und Rückschläge (Munich and Salzburg 1973); J. Chrysostomus, "Die Problematik der heutigen russischen Kirche des Moskauer Patriarchates," Festschrift für Bernhard Stasiewski. Beiträge zur ostdeutschen und osteuropäischen Kirchengeschichte, by G. Adriányi and J. Gottschalk (Cologne and Vienna 1975), 203–12; O. Luchterhandt, Der Sowjetstaat und die Russisch-Orthodoxe Kirche. Eine rechtshistorische und rechtssystematische Untersuchung (Cologne 1976).

THE RUMANIAN PATRIARCHATE: F. Popan, "Le caractère occidental de la théologie roumaine d'aujourd'hui," OstkSt 8 (1959), 169–83; F. Popan and C. Drašković, op. cit.; F. Popan, "Die rumänische Orthodoxe Kirche in ihrer jüngsten Entwicklung 1944–64," Kirche im Osten 9 (1965), 67–82; E. C. Suttner, "Ökumenismus in der Rumänischen Orthodoxen Kirche unter Patriarch Justinian," OrChrP 41 (1975), 399–448; id., "50 Jahre rumänisches Patriarchat. Seine Geschichte und die Entwicklung seines Kirchenrechts," OstkSt 24 (1975), 136–75; 25 (1976), 105–37.

ADDITIONAL ORTHODOX CHURCHES

THE ORTHODOX CHURCH IN GREECE: T. Haramlambides, "Die Kirchenpolitik Griechenlands. Beitrag zur Kulturgeschichte Neugriechenlands von 1821–1935," ZKG 55 (1936), 158–92; D. Savramis, "Die griechisch-orthodoxe Kirche und die soziale Frage," OstkSt 7 (1958), 66–84; P. Bratsiotis, "Die Theologen-Bruderschaft 'ZOË,'" ZRGG 12 (1960), 371–84; P. Poulitsas, "Die Beziehungen zwischen Staat und Kirche in Griechenland," P. Bratsiotis, Die orthodoxe Kirche II, 38–48; K. Papapetrou, "Die Säkularisation und die Orthodox-Katholische Kirche Griechenlands," Kyrios n.s. 3 (1963), 193–205; H. J. Härtel, "Zur kirchenpolitischen Krise in Griechenland," OstkSt 15 (1966), 39–49; G. Podskalsky, "Kirche und Staat in Griechenland," TThZ 76 (1967), 298–322; H. M. Biedermann, "Orthodoxe Kirche und Migration im heutigen Griechenland," OstkSt 24 (1975), 51–68.

THE ORTHODOX CHURCH IN ALBANIA: "Götzen gegen Gott. 'Die Religion des Albaners ist der Albanismus,'" Osteuropa 242 (1974), A 599–A 620; B. Tönnes, "Religionen in Albanien. Enver Hoxha und die 'nationale Eigenart,'" ibid., 661–75; id., "Religion und Kirche in Albanien," Kirche in Not 24 (Königstein im Taunus 1976), 101–9.

THE ORTHODOX CHURCH IN MACEDONIA: D. Slijepčević, Pitanje Makedonske pravoslavne crkve u Jugoslaviji (Munich 1959); S. K. Pavlowitsch, "The Orthodox Church in Yugoslavia. The Problem of the Macedonian Church," Eastern Church Review 1 (1967/68), 374–86; N. Thon, op. cit., 141–42.

The Orthodox Church in Poland: I. Grüning, Die autokephale östlich-orthodoxe Kirche in Polen in den Jahren 1922–1939: Jahrbuch des Osteuropainstituts zu Breslau 1940 (Breslau 1941), 111–26; B. Spuler, "Die Orthodoxe Kirche in Polen," Osteuropa-Hdb. Polen, ed. by W. Markert (Cologne and Graz 1959), 114–18; T. Lissek, "Die Heilige Autokephale Orthodoxe Kirche Polens," Kyrios n.s. 6 (1966), 43–54; N. Thon, op. cit., 142–46; B. Stasiewski, "Kirchen- und Religionsgemeinschaften," Länderberichte Osteuropa II Polen, ed. by the Johann-Gottfried-Herder-Institut (Munich and Vienna 1976), 256–57.

The Orthodox Church in Czechoslovakia: V. Grigorič, Pravoslavná církev ve státě Československém (Prague 1928); R. Urban, "Die orthodoxe Kirche des Ostens in der Čechoslovakei," Kyrios 3 (1938), 89–97; R. Jakowlewitsch, "Die Orthodoxe Kirche in der Tschechoslowakei," Stimme der Orthodoxie (Berlin 1966), 56–62; N. Thon, op. cit., 146–50.

Independent Extraterritorial Orthodox Churches: W. Haugg, "Die orthodoxe Kirche des Ostens in Deutschland. Grundzüge ihres Rechts- und Glaubenslebens," Kyrios 4 (1939/40), 57–67; D. Doroschenko, "Die Ukrainische Östlich-Orthodoxe Kirche in Kanada und in den Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika," Kyrios 5 (1940/41), 153–57; W. Haugg, "Materialien zur Geschichte der östlich-orthodoxen Kirche in Deutschland," ibid., 288–334; H. M. Biedermann, "Die ostkirchlichen Gemeinschaften in USA und in Kanada," OstkSt 3 (1954), 164–78; P. Yuzyk, Ukrainian Greek-Orthodox Church of Canada 1918 to 1951 (Minneapolis 1958); F. Heyer, "Geschichte der Orthodoxen Kirche in Amerika," Kirche im Osten 5 (1962), 9–50; A. A. Bogolepov, Toward an American Orthodox Church. The Establishment of an Autocephalous Orthodox Church (New York 1963); Die Orthodoxen Exilkirchen in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, ed. by the Ökumenische Kommission für die Unterstützung Orthodoxer Priester in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (Munich 1965); J. Madey, "Die Präsenz der Ostkirchen in Westeuropa," Kyrios n.s. 10 (1970), 171–73; G. Seide, "Die Russisch-Orthodoxe Kirche in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland," OstkSt 20 (1971), 159–84; J. Chrysostomus, "Die dritte Gesamtsynode der russischen Auslandskirche," OstkSt 24 (1975), 38–50; N. Thon, op. cit., 130–41; P. Wiertz, "Orthodoxe Kirchen in Deutschland, Anfänge und Entwicklung," Una Sancta 30 (1975), 86–87.

The Eastern Pre-chalcedonian National Churches: C. Fink, "Die getrennten Kirchen des Morgenlandes," in P. Krüger and J. Tyciak, eds., Morganländisches Christentum. Wege zu einer ökumenischen Theologie (Paderborn 1940), 23–48; R. Janin, op. cit. 528–37; D. Attwater, op. cit. II, 170–231; B. Spuler, Die Morgenländischen Kirchen (Leiden 1964); A. S. Atiya, A History of Eastern Christianity (London 1968); B. Spuler, Gegenwartslage der Ostkirchen, 259–320; W. de Vries, "Die getrennten Kirchen des Ostens," K. Algermissen, op. cit., 86–147; F. Heiler, op. cit. 303–405; B. Spuler, Die morgenländischen Kirchen seit 1965 (1973), 163–74; J. Aßfalg and P. Krüger, eds., Kleines Wörterbuch des Christlichen Orients (Wiesbaden 1975).

The Nestorian Church: R. S. Stafford, The Tragedy of the Assyrians (London 1935); J. John, The Nestorians and their Muslim Neighbors. A Study of Western Influence on Their Relations (New Jersey 1961); H. Anschütz, "Die Gegenwartslage der 'Apostolischen Kirche des Ostens' und ihre Beziehungen zur 'assyrischen' Nationalbewegung," OstkSt 18 (1969), 122–45.

THE MONOPHYSITE CHURCHES

THE WEST-SYRIAN JACOBITE CHURCH: W. de Vries, Der Kirchenbegriff der von Rom getrennten Syrer (Rome 1955); H. Anschütz, "Die heutige Situation der westsyrischen Christen (Jakobiten) im Tur 'Abdin im Südosten der Türkei," OstkSt 16 (1967), 150–99.

THE SYRIAN ORTHODOX MALABAR CHURCH: E. R. Hambye, "The Syrian Jacobites in India, A Survey of Their Past and Present Position," ECQ 11 (1955), 115–29; P. J. Podipara, Die Thomas-Christen (Würzburg 1966); N. J. Thomas, Die Syrisch-Orthodoxe Kirche der Südindischen Thomas-Christen. Geschichte, Kirchenverfassung, Lehre (Würzburg 1967); P. Verghese, ed., Die Syrischen Kirchen in Indien (Stuttgart 1974).

THE COPTIC CHURCH: R. Strothmann, Die koptische Kirche in der Neuzeit (Tübingen 1932, reprint Nendeln, Liechtenstein 1966); M. Cramer, Das Christlich-Koptische Ägypten, einst und heute. Eine Orientierung (Wiesbaden 1959); S. Chauleur, Histoire des Coptes d'Égypte (Paris 1960); E. Wakim, A Lonely Minority. The Modern Story of Egypt Copts (New York 1963); P. Verghese, ed., Koptisches Christentum. Die orthodoxen Kirchen Ägyptens und Äthiopiens (Stuttgart 1973), 9–129.

THE ETHIOPIAN CHURCH: J. G. Coulbeaux, Histoire politique et religieuse d'Abyssinie depuis les temps les plus reculés jusqu'à l'avènement de Menelik, 3 vols. (Paris 1929); E. Hammerschmidt, "Kaisertum, Volkstum und Kirche in Äthiopien," OstkSt 6 (1957), 35–45; id., Äthiopien. Christliches Reich zwischen Gestern und Morgen (Wiesbaden 1967); The Church of Ethiopia. A Panorama of History and Spiritual Life, a Publication of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church (Addis Ababa 1970); F. Heyer, Die Kirche Äthiopiens. Eine Bestandsaufnahme (Berlin and New York 1971), continued in: Ökum. Rundschau 26 (1977), 196–204; P. Verghese, Koptisches Christentum, 133–207.

THE ARMENIAN CHURCHES: M. Ormanian, The Church of Armenia. Her History, Doctrine, Rule, Discipline, Liturgy, Literature and Existing Condition (London 1955); J. Mécérian, Histoire et institutions de l'Église arménienne. Évolution nationale, spiritualité, monachisme (Beirut 1965); A. K. Sanjian, The Armenian Communities in Syria under Ottoman Dominion (Cambridge, Mass. 1965); M. Krikorian and J. Madey, "The Armenian Church. Extension, Hierarchy, Statistics," OstkSt 21 (1972), 323–25; B. Brentjes, Drei Jahrtausende Armenian (Vienna and Munich 1974); N. Thon, op. cit., 151–60.

SECTION THREE

The Church in the Individual Countries

17. The Church in Northern, Eastern, and Southern Europe

LITERATURE

GENERAL: F. LAMA: Papst und Kurie in ihrer Politik nach dem Weltkrieg (Illertissen 1925); J. Schmidlin, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit 3/4 (Munich 1936–39); A.

Brunello, La Chiesa del Silenzio (Rome 1953); Gsovski, ed., Church and State behind the Iron Curtain. Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Romania with an Introduction in the Soviet Union (New York 1955); A. Galter, Libro rosso della Chiesa perseguitata (Mailand 1956); W. de Uries, Kirche und Staat in der Sowjetunion (Munich 1959); K. Hutten, Christen hinter dem eisernen Vorhang. Die christliche Gemeinde in der kommunistischen Welt, 2 vols. (Stuttgart 1962–63); W. Daim, Der Vatikan und der Osten (Frankfurt am Main 1967); M. Lehmann, ed., Die katholischen Donauschwaben in den nachfolgestaaten 1918–1945 im Zeichen des Nationalismus (Freilassing 1972); T. Beeson, ed., Discretion and Valour. Religious Conditions in Russia and Eastern Europe (Glasgow 1974); L. Schöppe, Konkordate seit 1800. Originaltext und deutsche Übersetzung der geltenden Konkordate (Frankfurt 1964); Die Religionsfreiheit in Osteuropa nach Helsinki. Recht und Wirklichkeit. Erfahrungen von Katholiken. Eine Dokumentation, ed. by the Institut Glaube in der 2. Welt (Küsnacht and Zurich 1977); Christen unter dem Kreuz. Beiträge zur Information über die gegenwärtige Bedrohung der Kirche in zahlreichen Ländern der Welt, ed. by the Pressestelle im Sekretariat der Deutschen Bischofskonferenz (Bonn 1976).

Scandinavian Countries: J. O. Anderssen, Survey of the History of the Church in Denmark (Copenhagen 1930); F. Siegmund-Schultze, ed., Die skandinavischen Länder (Ekklesia. Eine Sammlung von Selbstdarstellungen der christlichen Kirchen) 2 and 2/8 (Leipzig 1936–38); P. G. Linhardt, Den nordiske kirken historie (Copenhagen 1945); K. Harmer, Bishop Josef Brems (Copenhagen 1945); H. Holzapfel, Unter nordischen Fahnen (Paderborn 1955); H. Holmquist, Handbok i Svensk kyrkohistoria, 3 vols. (Stockholm 1948–52); A. V. Palmquist, Die römisch-katholische Kirche in Schweden nach 1781, 2 vols. (Uppsala 1954–58); B. Gustafsson, Svensk kyrkohistoria (Stockholm 1963); I. Welle, Norges Kirkehistorie (Oslo 1948); E. Molland, Church Life in Norway 1800–1950 (Minneapolis 1957); H. Rieber-Mohn, Catholicism in Norway (London 1959); E. D. Vogt, The Catholic Church in the North (Bergen 1962); K. R. Brotherus, Staat und Kirche in Finnland (Königsberg 1931); G. Sentzke, Die Kirche Finnlands (Göttingen 1935); A. Inkinen, L'Église catholique en Finland (Bourges 1936); L. Pinomaa, ed., Finnish Theology, Past and Present (Helsinki 1963); G. Sentzke, Finland. Its Church and Its People (Helsinki 1963).

Baltic Countries: J. Mauclère, La situation de l'Église en Lithuanie (Le Raincy 1950); R. Wittram, ed., Baltische Kirchengeschichte (Göttingen 1956); A. Namsons, "Die Lage der katholischen Kirche in Sowjetlitauen," Acta Baltica 1 (1962), 120–30; J. Aunver, "Estlands christliche Kirche der Gegenwart," ibid., 75–92; K. Rukis, "Die Verfolgung der katholischen Kirche in Sowjetlettland," ibid., 93–109; J. Klesment, "Sowjetische Kirchenpolitik in den besetzten baltischen Staaten," Acta Baltica 5 (1966), 112–26; E. Dubnaitis, "Der totale Kampf gegen Religion und Geistlichkeit in den besetzten baltischen Ländern," ibid., 127–99; "Chronik der kath. Kirche Litauens," ibid. 14 (1974), 9–123; "Chronik d. Litauischen Kirche," ibid. 15 (1975), 9–101; "Die neuesten Berichte und Dokumente über die Lage der Kirche in den baltischen Ländern," ibid. 16 (1976).

The Soviet Union: A. M. Amman, Abriß der ostslawischen Kirchengeschichte (Vienna 1950); C. N. Cianfarra, The Vatican and the Kremlin (New York 1950); J. S. Curtiss, The Russian Church and the Soviet State 1917–1950 (Boston 1953); G. Prokoptschuk, Der Metropolit. Leben und Wirken des großen Förderers der Kirchenunion Andreas Scheptytzkyj (Munich 1955); M. Spinka, The Church in Soviet Russia (New York 1956); I. Wlasovsky, Outline of the History of the Ukrainian Church (New York 1956); A. Bogolepov, Zerkov pod vlastin kommunisma (The Church under Communist Domination)(Munich 1958); W. de Vries, Kirch und Staat in der Sowjetunion (Munich 1959); B. Stasiewski, "Sowjetische Religionspolitik," Hochland 52 (1960), 315–24; B. Ivanov, ed., Religion in the USSR (Munich 1960); A. Kischkowsky, Die sowjetische Religionspolitik und die russische orthodoxe Kirche (Munich 1960); W. Kolarz, Religion in the Soviet Union (New York 1961); C. Grunwald, The Churches and the Soviet Union (New York 1962); N. Struve, Les Chrétiens en URSS (Paris 1963); B. Feron, Gott in Sowjetrußland (Essen 1963); B. Stasiewski, "Die Lage der christlichen Kirchen in der Sowjetunion," Sowjetunion. Werden und Gestalt einer Weltmacht, ed. by H. Ludat (Gießen 1963), 259–80; C. Korolevskij, Métropolite André Szeptyckyj 1865–1944 (Rome 1964); K. G. Kindermann, Rom ruft Moskau (Baden-Baden 1965); W. Leonhardt, Kreml und der Vatikan (Hanover 1965); M. Mourin, Der Vatikan und die Sowjetunion (Munich 1967); W. Daim, Der Vatikan und der Osten (Vienna 1967); J. Madey, Kirche zwischen Ost und West. Beiträge zur Geschichte der Ukrainischen und Weißruthenischen Kirche (Munich 1969); N. Theodorowitsch, Religion und Atheismus in der UdSSR. Dokumente und Berichte (Munich 1970); A. Martin, Die Gläubigen in Rußland. Die offizielle Kirche in Frage gestellt. Dokumentation der Christenverfolgung in der Sowjetunion (Lucerne and Munich 1971); E. Winter, Rom und Moskau. Ein halbes Jahrtausend in ökumenischer Sicht (Vienna 1972); idem, Die Sowjetunion und der Vatikan, 3. Teil: Rußland und das Papsttum (Berlin 1972); D. Konstantinow, Die Kirche in der Sowjetunion nach dem Kriege (Munich and Salzburg 1973); G. Simon, "Kirchen und Religionsgemeinschaften," Länderberichte Osteuropa I, Sowjetunion, ed. by the Koordinationsausschuß deutscher Osteuropa-Institute (Munich 1974), 320–30; Sowjetunion 1974/75, ed. by the Bundesinstitut f. ostwissenschaftl. u. internationale Studien (Vienna and Munich 1975), esp. 76–81.

POLAND: W. Meysztowicz, L'Église catholique en Pologne entre deux guerres 1919–1939 (Vatican City 1944); W. Bieńkowski, Polityka Watykanu wobec Polski (Warsaw 1949); E. Ligocki, Miedzy Watikanem a Polska (Warsaw 1949); J. Szufdrzyński, "Polozenie Kościóla w Polsce," Kultura 5 (1953), 5–49; S. Wielkowski and W. Czarnecki, Kościól katolicki w Polsce Ludowej (Warsaw 1953); K. Papée, Pius XII. a Polska 1939–1949 (Rome 1954); W. Zylinski and B. Wierzbianski, eds., White Paper on the Persecution of the Church in Poland (London 1954); C. Naurois, Dieu contre Dieu? Drames des catholiques progressistes dans une église du silence (Fribourg and Paris 1956); J. Umiński, Historia Kościóla ed. by W. Urban, 2 vols. (Opole 1959–60); B. Stasiewski, "Die Kirchenpolitik der Nationalsozialisten im Warthegau 1939–1945," Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte 7 (1959), 46–74; B. Stasiewski, "Die römisch-katholische Kirche," Osteuropa-Handbuch, Polen, ed. by W. Markert (Cologne and Graz 1959), 103–8; B. Stasiewski, "Die Kirchenpolitik der polnischen Regierung," ibid., 356–66; idem, "Die Jahrtausendfeier Polens in kirchengeschichtlicher Sicht," Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, n.s. 8 (1960), 313–29; P. Lenert, L'Église catholique en Pologne (Paris 1962); F. Manthey, Polnische Kirchengeschichte (Hildesheim 1965); H. Holzapfel, Das katholische Polen heute (Munich 1967); J. J. Zatko, ed., The Valley of Silence. Catholic Thought in Contemporary Poland (Notre Dame and London 1967); B. Stasiewski, "Kirchen und Religionsgemeinschaften," Länderberichte Osteuropa II, Polen, ed. by the Koordinationsausschuß deutscher Osteuropa-Institute (Munich and Vienna 1976), 241–261.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA: F. Dvornik, "Évolution de l'église catholique en Tchécoslovaquie depuis la guerre," Le Monde slave 7 (1930), 260–75; F. Siegfried-Schultze, ed., Die Kirchen der Tschechoslowakei (Leipzig 1937); R. Urban, Die slavisch-nationalkirchlichen Bestrebungen in der Tschechoslowakei (Leipzig 1938); L. Němec, Church and State in Czechoslovakia, Historically, Juridically and Theologically Documented (New York 1955); A. Michel, Problèmes religieus dans un pays sous régime communiste (Paris 1955); T. J. Zubek, The Church of Silence in Slovakia (Whinting, Ind. 1956); V. Chalupka, Situation of the Catholic Church in Czechoslovakia (Chicago 1960); J. Inovecky, Golgotha ist ganz nahe. Passion der Ordensschwestern in der Tschechoslowakei (Fribourg 1967); Kirche, Recht und Land. Festschrift Weihbischof Prof. Dr. Adolf Kindermann ed., K. Reiß and H. Schütz (Königstein and Munich 1969); J. Hopfner, Kirche in der ČSSR (Munich 1970); R. Urban, Die tschechoslowakische hussitische Kirche (Marburg 1973); J. Mareckova, Duchovné prudy v našej Republike 2: Prudy cirkevné (Bratislava 1926); Tisic let pražského biskupstvi 973–1973 ed. by the Ceska Kath. Caritas (Prague 1973); F. Seibt, ed., Bohemia Sacra. Das Christentum in Böhmen 973–1973 (Düsseldorf 1974). In it see especially: H. Slapnicka, Die Kirchen in der Ersten Republik, 333–44; B. Černy, Die Kirchen im Protektorat 1939–1945, 345–54; H. Lemberg, Die Kirche in unserem Jahrhundert 1918–1973, 26–32; V. Svoboda, Die innere Entwicklund des tschechischen Katholizismus in den letzten hundert Jahren, 162–74; Situation der katholischen Kirche in der Tschechoslowakei. Dokumente, Berichte, ed. by the Schweizerische National-Kommission Justitia et Pax (Freiburg i. Ue. 1976).

HUNGARY: S. Swift, The Cardinal's Story: Life and Works of Joseph Cardinal Mindszenty (New York 1949); Joseph Cardinal Mindszenty, Memoirs (New York 1974); Ambord, Der Vatikan und die Kirche hinter dem Eisernen Vorhang. Dokumente und Kommentare zum Budapester Geschehen (Vatican City 1949); Mindszenty, Dokumentation, ed. by J. Vecsey and J. Schwendemann, 3 vols. (St. Pölten 1956–59); Z. Nyisztor, Ötven esztendö. Századunk katolikus megujhõdása (Vienna 1962); J. Vecsey, ed., Kardinal Mindszenty. Beiträge zu seinem siebzigsten Geburtstag (Munich 1962); J. Lévai, Geheime Reichssache. Papst Pius XII hat nicht geschwiegen. Berichte, Dokumente, Akten zusammengestellt aufgrund kirchlichen und staatlichen Archivmaterials (Cologne and Müngersdorf 1966); E. András and J. Morel, Bilanz des ungarischen Katholizismus. Kirche und Gesellschaft in Dokumenten, Zahlen und Analysen (Munich 1969); M. Beresztóczy. A katolikus békemozgalom husz éve (Budapest 1970); A. Meszlényi, A magyar hercegprimások arcképsorozata 1707–1945 (Budapest 1970); A. Csizmadia, Rechtliche Beziehungen von Staat und Kirche in Ungarn vor 1944 (Budapest 1971), and the review of it by G. Adriányi, Ungarn-Jahrbuch 4 (1972), 208–10; J. Staber, "Die katholische Kirche in Ungarn seit 1918," Der Donauraum 18 (1973), 200–219; G. Salacz, A magyar katolikus egyház a szomszédos államok uralma alatt (Munich 1975); J. Mindszenty, Erinnerungen (Frankfurt, Berlin and Vienna 1974); G. Adriányi, Fünfzig Jahre ungarischer Kirchengeschichte 1895–1945 (Mainz 1974); Handbuch des ungarischen Katholizismus, ed. by the Ungarische Kirchensoziologische Institut (Vienna 1975); J. Közi-Horváth, Kardinal Mindszenty (Königstein 1976).

RUMANIA: N. Pop, Kirche unter Hammer und Sichel. Die Kirchenverfolgung in Rumänien 1945–1951 (Berlin 1953); A. Mircea, Persecución comunista de la Religión en Romania (Madrid 1954); P. Gherman, L'âme roumaine écartelée. Faits et documents (Paris 1955); E. Janin, Istoria Bisericii Romine, 2 vols. (Bucharest 1957–58); P. Tocanel, Storia della Chiesa cattolica in Romania (Padua 1960); F. Popan, "Die heutige Lage der rumänischen Katholiken," Ostkirchliche Studien 11 (1962), 183–92; R. Grulich, "Zur Lage der Kirche in Rumänien," Informationsdienst des Katholischen Arbeitskreises für zeitgenössische Fragen e.V. 76 (1976), 68–77.

YUGOSLAVIA: A. Hudal, Die serbische-orthodoxe Nationalkirche (Graz 1922); K. S. Graganovic, Le Système général de l'église en Jougoslavie (Sarajevo 1939); H. Schwalm, J. Matl, B. Spuler and L. Müller, "Kirchen und Glaubensgemeinschaften in Jugoslawien," Osteuropa-Handbuch, Jugoslawien, ed. by W. Markert (Cologne and Graz 1954), 173–91; W. de Vries, Une église du silence. Catholiques de Jougoslavie (Paris and Bruges 1954); D. M. Slijepčević, Istoria Srbske Pravoslavne Crkve (Munich 1962); G. Stadtmüller, "Die Kirchen und Konfessionen Jugoslawiens," Jugoslawien zwischen West und Ost, ed. by H. Ludat (Gießen 1963), 37–55; R. Stupperich, ed., Kirche und Staat in Bulgarien und Jugoslawien (Witten 1971); J. Buturac and A. Ivandija, Povijest katolicke crkve medu Hrvatima (Zagreb 1973); A. Rauch, "Kirchen und Religionsgemeinschaften," Südosteuropa-Handbuch 1: Jusgoslawien, ed. by K. D. Grothusen (Göttingen 1875), 345–59.

BULGARIA: D. M. Slijepčević, Die bulgarische orthodoxe Kirche (Munich 1957); A. Galter, Rotbuch der verfolgten Kirche (Recklinghausen 1957), 241–53; M. Zambonardi, La chiesa autocefala bulgara (Gorizia 1960); I. Sofranov, Histoire du mouvement bulgare vers l'église catholique au XIX^e^ siècle (Rome 1960); R. Stupperich, ed., Kirche und Staat in Bulgarien und Jugoslawien (Witten 1971); C. Ognjanoff, Bulgarien (Nuremberg 1975), esp. 130–43, 480–82; Cerkvi i izpovedania v Narodna Republika Bulgaria ed. by the Sinodalno izdatelstvo (Sofia 1975).

ALBANIA: G. Petrotta, "Il cattolicesimo nei Balcani. L'Albania," La Tradizione 1 (1928), 165–203; N. Borgia, I monaci basiliani d'Italia in Albania, 2 vols. (Rome 1935–42); W. de Vries, "Die Kirche in Albanien," StdZ 149 (1951/52), 467; A. Galter, Rotbuch der verfolgten Kirche (Recklinghausen 1957), 221–53; B. Tönnes, "Religionskampf in Albanien," Informationsdienst des katholischen Arbeitskreises für zeitgeschichtliche Fragen e.V. 74 (1975), 73–81.

18. The Church in German-Speaking Countries (Germany, Austria, Switzerland)

LITERATURE

GERMANY: Bihlmeyer-Tüchle III, 498–503, 514–28; Schmidlin PG III, 217–28; IV, 156–67; Maron, 262–70.—To 1945: W. Spael, Das katholische Deutschland im 20. Jahrhundert (Würzburg 1964), 176–351. After 1945: F. Spotts, Kirchen und Politik in Deutschland (Stuttgart 1976).—Brief Biographies (with literature): R. Morsey, ed., Zeitgeschichte in Lebensbildern I (Mainz 1973) (W. Marx, L. Kaas, Cardinal Bertram); 2 (Mainz 1975)(F.v. Papen, K. Adenauer, and the cardinals Faulhaber, Preysing, and Galen).

AUSTRIA: Bihlmeyer-Tüchle III, 503–505, 522ff., 528; Schmidlin PG III, 284–86; IV, 125–29; Maron, 271–73; J. Wodka, Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1959), 365–89; E. Weinzierl, ed., Kirche in Österreich 1918–1965 1 and 2 (Vienna 1966).—After 1945: E. Weinziere and K. Skalnik, eds, Österreich-Die Zweite Republik 1 and 2 (Vienna 1972).

SWITZERLAND: Schmidlin PG III, 276ff.; IV, 168ff.; Maron, 270ff.

19. The Church in the Benelux Countries

SOURCES

BELGIUM: Lettres pastorales des évêques de Belgique, 1800–1961 VI: 1906–1926; VII: 1926–1961; Actes du VI^e^ Congrès catholique de Malines, 8 vols. (Brussels 1937);

Verhandelingen van het VI^e^ Katholiek Kongress van Mechelen, 8 vols. (Brussels 1937); R. Houben and F. Ingham, Le pacte scolaire et son application (Brussels 1962); M. A. Walkkiers, Sources inédites relatives aux débuts de la J.O.C., 1919–1925 (Louvain 1970).

NETHERLANDS: Analecta (of the various dioceses in which the official pronouncements, letters, and addresses of the Dutch bishops are published); Katholiek Archief (since 1970 Archief van de kerken); Reports and memoranda of the Katholiek Sociaal-Kerkeliik Instituut (KASKI); Pastoral Concilie van de Nederlandse Kerkprovinicie, 7 parts (Amersfoort 1968–70).

LITERATURE

BELGIUM: J. Bartier, et al., Histoire de la Belgique contemporaine, 1914–1970 (Brussels 1974); T. Luyckx, Politieke geschiedenis van België van 1789 tot heden (Brussels 1973); E. de Moreau, Le catholicisme en Belgique (Liège 1928); J. Kerkhofs and J. Van Houtte, eds., De Kerk in Vlaanderen. Pastoraal-sociologische studie van het leven en de structuur der Kerk (Tielt 1962); "Structures et évolution du monde catholique en Belgique," Courrier hebdomadaire du C.R.I.S.P 252–254 (10 février 1967); K. Dobbelaere and J. Billiet, "Godsdienst in België. Een sociologische verkenning," De gids op maatschappelijk gebied 64 (1973), 879–94, 983–98 ; 65 (1974), 39–56; R. Aubert, "L'Église catholique et la vie politique en Belgique depuis la seconde guerre mondiale," Res publica 15 (1973), 183–203; R. Boudens, Kardinaal Mercier en de Vlaamse Beweging (Louvain 1975); J. Kempeneers, Le cardinal Van Roey en son temps, 1874–1961 (Brussels 1971); W. Plavsic, Le cardinal Van Roey (Brussels 1974); H. Haag, Rien ne vaut l'honneur. L'Église belge de 1940 à 1945 (Brussels 1946); R. Aubert, "Organisation et caractère des mouvements de jeunesse en Belgique," Politica e Storia 28 (1972), 271–323; P. Joye and R. Lewin, L'Église et le mouvement ouvrier en Belgique (Brussels 1967); S. H. Scholl, ed., 150 jaar katholieke arbeidersbeweging in België (1789–1939) I: De katholieke arbeidersbeweging (1914–1939) (Brussels 1966); J. Verhoeven, Joseph Cardijn, prophète de notre temps (Brussels 1971); A. Dendooven, Ontstaan, structuur en werking van de Vlaamse K.A.J. (Antwerp 1967); L. Voyé, Sociologie du geste religieux. De l'analyse de la pratique dominicale en Belgique à une interprétation théorique (Brussels 1973); J. Pirotte, Périodiques missionnaires belges d'expression française. Reflet de cinquante années d'évolution d'une mentalité 1889–1940 (Louvain 1973); P. Debouxhtai, Antoine le guérisseur et l'Antoinisme (Liège 1934); id., L'Antoinisme (Liège 1945).

LUXEMBURG: G. Trausch, Un demi siècle d'histoire contemporaine luxembourgeoise, 1914/18–1973: Cinquantenaire de la Chambre du Travail (Luxemburg 1973); A. Heiderscheid, Aspect de sociologie religieuse du diocèse de Luxembourg (Luxemburg 1961–62).

NETHERLANDS: L. J. Rogier, In vrijheid herboren (The Hague 1953); L. J. Rogier and P. Brachin, Histoire du catholicisme hollandaise depuis le XVI^e^ siècle (Paris 1974); S. Stokman, Het verzet van de Nederlandse bisschoppen tegen nationaal-socialisme en Duitse tyrannie (Utrecht 1945); H. W. F. Aukes, Kardinaal de Jong (Utrecht and Antwerp 1956); J. G. M. Thurlings, De wankele zuil. Nederlandse katholieken tussen assimilatie en pluralisme (Nijmegen and Amersfoort 1971); M. Schmaus, J. Scheffczyk and J. Giers, Exempel Holland (Berlin 1972); W. Goddijn, De beheerste kerk. Uitgestelde revolutie in R.K. Nederland (Amsterdam and Brussels 1973); J. Roes, Het groote missieuur, 1915–1940. De missiemotivatie van de Nederlandse katholiek (Bilthoven 1974); J. Lescrauwaet et al., Bilanz der niederländischen Kirche (Düsseldorf 1976); Alfrink en de kerk 1951–1976 (Baarin 1976); Jaarboeken van het katholiek documentatiecentrum (KDC) (Nijmegen 1971–75).

20. Catholicism in Italy

LITERATURE

Publications on Italian Catholicism were until the 1950s lacking in content and originality. Two recent developments have altered this, the rise of an Italian Catholic Party and a new interest in the development of Catholicism following the Second Vatican Council. The results have not always been positive, owing to faulty documentation and the continuing influence of politics.

GENERAL WORKS: F. F. Chabod, L’Italia contemporanea (1918–1948) (Turin 1961); F. Catalano, Dalla crisi del primo dopoguerra alla fondazione della repubblica: Storia d’Italia, ed. by N. Valeri, V (Turin 1965); G. Mammarella, L’Italia dopo il fascismo (1943–1968) (Bologna 1970); R. Romano and C. Vivanti, eds., Storia d’Italia, 10 vols. (Turin 1972–76); see also the observations of G. Penco and G. Martina in: RSCI 30 (1976), 119–55; L. Cavalli, Sociologa della storia italiana (1861–1974) (Bologna 1974).—For Statistics: Instituto centrale di statistica, Annuario statistico italiano, Annuario statistico dell’istruzione, Sommario di statistiche storiche dell’Italia, 1865–1965; S. Burgalassi, Il comportamento religioso degli italiani (Florence 1968).—On religious problems: Segreteria di stato. Ufficio centrale di statistica, Raccolta di tavole statistiche (Vatican City 1971ff.). Indispensable is consultation of such periodicals as La Civiltà Cattolica, RSCI, AHPont, Storia contemporanea, Rivista di storia contemporanea, Quaderni storici, Bollettino dell’Archivio per la storia del movimento sociale cattolico in Italia, Studi storici.

WORKS ON CHURCH HISTORY: G. Martina, La chiesa nell’età dell’assolutismo, del liberalismo e del totalitarismo. Da Lutero ai nostri giorni (Brescia 1974); id., La chiesa in Italia negli ultimi trent’anni (Rome 1977); R. Aubert, “Le demi-siècle qui a préparé Vatican II,” Nouvelle histoire de l’Église V (Paris 1975), 581–926; A. C. Jemolo, Chiesa e stato negli ultimi cento anni (Turin 1963), new ed.: Chiesa e stato in Italia dall’unificazione a Giovanni XXIII (Turin 1965); M. Bendiscioli, “Chiesa e società nei secoli XIX e XX,” Nuove questioni di storia contemporanea I (Milan 1968), 325–447.

FIRST WORLD WAR: AA. VV., Il trauma dell’intervento (1914–1919) (Florence 1968); AA. VV., Benedetto XV, i cattolici e la prima guerra mondiale (Rome 1963); A. Monticone, La Germania e la neutralità italiana (1914–1915) (Bologna 1971); E. Forcella-A. Monticone, Plotone d’esecuzione. I processi della prima guerra mondiale (Bari 1972); M. Isnenghi, Il mito della grande guerra da Marinetti a Malaparte (Bari 1973).

FASCISM: B. Mussolini, Opera omnia, ed. by D. Susmel, 35 vols. (Florence 1951–63); G. Ciano, Diario, 2 vols. (Milan 1946); G. Pini and D. Susmel, Mussolini l’uomo e l’opera, 4 vols. (Florence 1953–55); R. De Felice, Mussolini, 4 vols. (Turin 1965–74); id., Le interpretazioni del fascismo (Bari 1969); G. Salvemini, Scritti sul fascismo (Milan 1963); F. Deakin, Storia della repubblica di Salò (Turin 1963); N. Valeri, Da Giolitti a Mussolini. Momenti della crisi del liberalismo (Milan 1967); D. Veneruso, La vigilia del fascismo (Bologna 1968); L. Salvatorelli and G. Mira, Storia d’Italia nel periodo fascista (Milan 1969); V. Castronuovo, La stampa italiana dall’unità al fascismo (Bari 1973); AA. VV., Fascismo e società italiana, ed. by G. Quazza (Turin 1973).—The Relationship of the Church to Fascism: R. Webster, La croce e i fasci (Milan 1964); P. Mazzolari, La chiesa, il fascismo e la guerra (Florence 1966); A. De Gasperi, Lettere sul concordato (Brescia 1970); P. Scoppola, La chiesa e il fascismo (Bari 1973); F. Molinari and V. Neri, Olio santo e olio di ricino (Turin 1976); S. Tramontin, Cattolici, popolari e fascisti nel Veneto (Rome 1975); A.

Fappani, Giorgio Montini (Rome 1974). For other controversies on the Catholic Action and the racial laws, see: A. Martini, Studi sulla questione romana e la Conciliazione (Rome 1963). Of interest also are the biographies of several bishops: G. Villani, Il vescovo Elia Dalla Costa. Per una storia da fare (Florence 1974); AA. VV., Il cardinale Giovanni Battista Nasalli Rocca di Corneliano, arcivescovo di Bologna (1872–1952), ed. by F. Molinari (Rome 1974).

Anti-Facism and Resistance Movements: F. Antonicelli, Dall' antifascismo alla resistenza (Turin 1961); P. Alatri, L'antifascismo italiano, 2 vols. (Rome 1961); AA. VV., Fascismo e antifascismo (Milan 1963); M. Bendiscioli, Antifascismo e resistenza (Rome 1964); R. Battagha, Storia della resistenza italiana (Turin 1970); L. Valiani, G. Bianchi, and E. Ragionieri, Azionisti e cattolici e comunisti nella resistenza italiana (Milan 1971); A. Fappani, La resistenza bresciana (Brescia 1965); G. Bonfanti, La resistenza. Documenti e testimonianze di storia contemporanea (Brescia 1976).

Culture: L. Allevi, "Mezzo secolo di teologia dogmatica e apologetica in Italia," SC 80 (1952), 365–85; L. Tondelli, "Cinquant' anni di studi biblici in Italia," ibid., 386–98; M. Pellegrino, "Un cinquantennio di studi patristici in Italia," ibid., 424–52; P. Barbaini, "Per la scuola di storia ecclesiastica," ibid. 92 (1964), 211–32, 317–33; 93 (1965), 335–70; B. Ferrari, La soppressione delle facoltà di teologia nelle università di stato (Bari 1968); F. Lazzari, "Le facoltà teologiche tra il Sillabo d l'abolizione," AA. VV., Un secolo da Porta Pia (Naples 1970), 249–87; M. Guasco, "L'organizzazione delle scuole e dei seminari," Modernismo, fascismo, comunismo, ed. by G. Rossini (Bologna 1972), 192–204; G. Rumi, "Padre Gemelli e l'Università Cattolica," ibid., 205–33; V. L. Mangoni, "Aspetti della cultura cattolica sotto il fascismo: la rivista 'Il Frontespizio,'" ibid., 363–417; V. L. Marranzini, "La teologia italiana dal Vaticano I al Vaticano II," Bilancio della teologia del XX secolo II (Rome 1972), 95–112; M. L. Crespi, "La storiografia contemporanea ilaliana di fronte a Martin Lutero," SC 100 (1972), 134–60; "Gli studi patristici in Italia negli ultimi vent'anni (1951–1970)"; ibid. 101 (1973), 107–39; G. Giavini, "Gli studi biblici in Italia negli anni dal 1950 al 1970," ibid., 9–42; G. Colombo, "La teologia italiana. Dommatica 1950–1970," ibid., 99–191; G. Tassani, La cultura politica della destra cattolica (Rome 1976).

Spirituality: M. Petrocchi, "Schema per una storia della spiritualità italiana negli ultimi cento anni," Spiritualità e azione del laicato cattolico italiano I (Padua 1969), 17–58; Bibliotheca sanctorum, 13 vols. (Rome 1961–70); Article, "Italy," Dictionnaire de spiritualité 7/2 (1971), 2294–2311.—For Religious Orders: Dizionario degli instituti di perfezione, 6 vols. (Rome 1973ff.); C. Bellò, Società ed evangelizzazione nell'Italia contemporanea. Linee di una storia e di una pastorale (Brescia 1974).—For Individuals: A. Barelli: M. Sticco, Una donna fra due mondi (Milan 1967). G. Calabria: Graziano della Madre di Dio, Profilo biografico di don Giovanni Calabria (Venice 1966). G. De Luca: H. Bernard-Maîtra and R. Guarnieri, Don Giuseppe De Luca et l'abbé Henri Bremond (1929–1933) (Rome 1965); R. Guarnieri Don Giuseppe De Luca tra cronaca e storia (1989–1962) (Bologna 1975). C. Ferrini: AA. V. V., Miscellanea Contardo Ferrini (Rome 1947); AA. VV., Scritti in onore di Contardo Ferrini, 4 vols. (Milan 1947). P. G. Frassati: Lettere, ed. by L. Frassati (Rome 1950). C. Gnocchi: A. Riccardi, Don Carlo Gnocchi (Bologna 1966); R. Lombardi, Per una mobilitazione generale dei cattolici (Rome 1948); id., Squilli di mobilitazione (Rome 1948); id., Crociata della bontà (Rome 1949); id. Esercitazioni per un mondo migliore (Rome 1961). B. Longo: M. E. Spreafico, Il servo di Dio Bartolo Longo (Pompei 1944). P. Mazzolari: A. Bergamaschi, Un contestatore per tutte le stagioni (Bologna 1968); C. Bellò "Primo Mazzolari prete," Studi cattolici 13 (1969); 163–68; N. Fabretti, Don Mazzolari, don Milani. I "disubbidienti" (Milan 1972); L.

Bedeschi, Obbedientissimo in Cristo. Lettere di don Mazzolari (Milan 1974); P. Mazzolari, Diario (1905–1926) e Lettere, ed. by A. Bergamaschi (Bologna 1974). L. Milani: Scuola di Barbiana, Lettera a una professoressa (Florence 1967); Lettere di Don Lorenzo Milani (Milan 1970); Lettere alla mamma (1943–1967) (Milan 1973); N. Fallaci, Dalla parte dell'ultimo, Vita del prete Lorenzo Milani (Milan 1974). G. Moscati: G. Papasogli, Vita di Giuseppe Moscati (Rome 1958). V. Necchi: P. Bondiolo, Vico Necchi fedele servo di Dio (Milan 1944); V. Necchi, Pensieri religiosi, ed. by P. Bondioli (Milan 1956). G. Salvadori: G. Salvadori, Lettere, ed. by P. P. Trompeo and N. Vian (Florence 1945); N. Vian, La giovinezza di G. Salvadori (Rome 1960); id., Amicizie e incontri di Giulio Salvadori (Rome 1962). G. Papini: G. Cattaneo, Giovanni Papini prima della conversione e dopo: Modernismo, fascismo, comunismo (Bologna 1972), 235–47. F. Tognazzi, "Don Milani nell'evoluzione dell'opinione pubblica," Testimonianze 18 (1975), 97–128.

FOREIGN MISSIONS: C. Bona, La rinascita missionaria in Italia. Dalle "Amicizie" all'Opera per la Propagazione della fede (Turin 1964); S. Beltrami, L'opera della Propagazione della fede in Italia (Florence 1961).—G. Allamano and the Missions of the Consolata: B. Bernardi, Il servo di Dio G. Allamano (Turin 1960); C. Bona, Il servo di Dio G. Allamano e un secolo di movimento missionario in Piemonte (Turin 1960); R. Grazia, La fisionomia spirituale del servo di Dio Giuseppe Allamano nei suoi scritti (Turin 1961); C. Pera, La spiritualità missionaria nel pensiero del servo di Dio Giuseppe Allamano (Turin 1973).—D. Comboni and the Combonians: C. Fusero, Daniele Comboni (Bologna 1961); P. Catrice, Un audacieux pionnier de l'Église, Mgr. Comboni et l'evangelisation de l'Afrique centrale (Lyon 1964); P. Chiocchetta, "La Preghiera missionaria di D. Comboni," La preghiera II, ed. by R. Boccassino (Milan and Rome 1967), 734–45,—G. M. Conforti and the Saveriani: V. Vanzin, Guido Maria Conforti (Parma 1949); L. Ballarin, L'anima missionaria di Guido Maria Conforti (Parmi 1962); A. Dagnino, Dottrina spirituale di Mons. Guido Maria Conforti (Milan 1966).—On the Pontificio Istituto Missioni Estere (PIME): A. Morelli, La spiritualità missionaria dal Patriarca Ramazzotti (Milan 1961); G. B. Tragella, Le Missioni Estere di Milano, 2 vols. (Milan 1950–59); P. Manna Virtù apostoliche (Milan 1964); Paolo Manna ieri e oggi (Naples 1966).

CATHOLIC MOVEMENTS: G. DeRosa, Storia del movimento cattolico in Italia, 2 vols. (Bari 1966); P. Scoppola, Chiesa e stato nella storia d'Italia. Storia documentaria dall'Unità alla repubblica (Bari 1967); AA. VV., Spiritualità e azione del laicato cattolico italiano, 2 vols. (Padua 1969); P. Borzomati, I giovani cattolici nel mezzogiorno d'Italia dall'Unità al 1948 (Rome 1970); La "Gioventù Cattolica" dopo l'Unità 1868–1968, L. Osbat and F. Piva, eds., (Rome 1972); G. Miccoli, "Chiesa e società in Italia dal Concilio Vaticano I (1870) al pontificato di Giovanni XXIII," Storia d'Italia V (Turin 1973), 1493–1548; AA. VV., Modernismo, fascismo, comunismo. Aspetti della politica e della cultura dei cattolici nel '900, ed. by G. Rossini (Bologna 1972); AA. VV., I cattolici tra fascismo e democrazia, ed. by P. Scoppola and F. Traniello (Bologna 1975); P. G. Zunino, La questione cattolica nella sinistra italiana (1919–1939) (Bologna 1975); G. Candeloro, Il movimento cattolico in Italia (Rome 1974); S. Tramontin, Sinistra cattolica di ieri e di oggi (Turin 1974); M. Reineri, Il movimento cattolico in Italia dall'unità al 1948 (Turin 1975); N. Antonetti, L'ideologia della sinistra cristiana. I cattolici tra chiesa e comunismo (1937–1945) (Milan 1976).—On the Renewal of Catholic Action: V. Bachelet, Il nuovo cammino dell'Azione Cattolica (Rome 1973).—On Rossi: M. V. Rossi, I giorni dell'onnipotenza. Memorie di una esperienza cattolica (Rome 1975).

THE ITALIAN PEOPLE'S PARTY: F. Malgeri, ed., Atti dei congressi del Partito Popolare Italiano (Brescia 1969); L. Sturzo, I discorsi politici (Rome 1951); id., La croce di

Constantino, ed. by G. De Rosa (Rome 1958); id., Il Partito Popolare Italiano (Bologna 1956).—On Sturzo: M. Vaussard, Il Pensiero politico e sociale di Luigi Sturzo (Brescia 1966); P. Stella, Don Luigi Sturzo, il prete di Caltagirone (Catania 1971); G. De Rosa, L'utopia di Luigi Sturzo (Brescia 1972); F. Malgeri and F. Piva, Vita di Luigi Sturzo (Rome 1972); G. De Rosa, Storia del movimento cattolico in Italia, 2 vols. (Bari 1966); id., Il Partito popolare Italiano (Bari 1969); id., Rufo Ruffo della Scalleta e Luigi Sturzo (Rome 1961); F. L. Ferrari, Il Domani d'Italia, ed. by G. P. Dore (Rome 1958); G. M. Rossi, Francesco Luigi Ferrari. Dalle Leghe bianche al Partito Popolare (Rome 1965); L. Bedeschi, I cattolici disobbedienti (Naples and Rome 1959); id., Dal movimento di Murri all'appello di Sturzo (Milan 1969); I Cattolici e l'attuazione dello stato democratico (Milan 1966); Il Partito Popolare. Validità di una esperienza (Milan 1969); Il Partito Popolare Italiano. Scritti e saggi nel 50° anniversario della sua fondazione (Rome 1970); S. Tramontin, Cattolici, popolari, fascisti nel Veneto (Rome 1975); C. F. Casula, Cattolici comunisti e sinistra cristiana (Bologna 1976); S. Accame, Gaetano de Sanctis fra cultura e politica. Esperienza di cattolici militanti a Torino 1919–1922 (Florence 1975).

THE CHRISTIAN-DEMOCRATIC PARTY: A. Damilano, ed., Atti Documenti della Democrazia Cristiana, 1943–1967, 2 vols. (Rome 1968); M. R. Catti De Gasperi, ed., De Gasperi scrive, 2 vols. (Brescia 1974).—Biographies of De Gasperi: M. R. Catti De Gasperi, De Gasperi uomo solo (Milan 1964); G. Andreotti, De Gasperi e il suo tempo (Milan 1964); id., De Gasperi e la ricostruzione (Rome 1974); P. Ottone, De Gasperi (Milan 1968).—On the Party: T. Godechot, Le parti démocrate-chrétien italien (Paris 1964); G. Baget-Bozzo, Il partito cristiano al potere. La DC di De Gasperi e di Dossetti, 2 vols. (Florence 1974).

CRISIS AND POSTCONCILIAR RENEWAL: G. De Rosa, Cattolici e comunisti oggi in Italia. La via italiana al socialismo e il dialogo coi cattolici (Rome 1966); id., Chiesa e comunismo in Italia (Rome 1970); id., Il dissenso cattolico (Rome 1974); C. Falconi, La contestazione nella chiesa (Milan 1969); A. Nesti, ed., L'altra chiesa in Italia (Milan 1970); R. La Valle, Dalla parte di Abele (Milan 1971); R. Sciubba and R. Sciubba Pace, Le comunità di base in Italia, 2 vols. (Rome 1976).—On Pastoral Problems and Bishops' Conferences: G. Feliciani, Le conferenze episcopali (Bologna 1974).—On Problems of Confession: L. Rossi, ed., La crisi della confessione (Bologna 1974).—On the Liturgical Movement: Rivista liturgica 61 (1974), 9–179.—Catechesis: "La pastorale catechetica in Italia," Presenza pastorale 45 (1975), 1105–89.—On Concordat Revision: AA. VV., Studi per la revisione del Concordato (Padua 1970); AA. VV., Individuo, gruppi, confessioni religiose nello stato democratico (Milan 1973); C. Pelosi, "La revisione del concordato," Humanitas 29 (1974), 894–918; 30 (1975) 24–42.

21. The Catholic Church of France

BIBLIOGRAPHY

A Latreille, J. R. Palanque, E. Delaruelle and R. Rémond, Histoire du Catholicisme en France. La période contemporaine (Paris 1962); A. Dansette, Histoire religieuse de la France contemporaine sous la III^e^ république (Paris 1951); id., Destin du catholicisme français 1926–1936 (Paris 1957); P. Lesourd and C. Paillat, Dossier secret de l'Église de France II: De la révolution a nos jours (Paris 1968); F. Bouland, "Essor ou déclin du Clergè français?" Rencontres 34 (Paris 1950); J. Gadille, "France, VI. La période contemporaine," Dictionnaire d'Histoire et de Géographie ecclésiastique, fasc. 102–103, p. 143–57, with biblio.; Panorama de la France. La documentation francaise (Paris 1966); P. Gerbod, "Les catholiques et l'enseignement secondaire (1919–1939)," Revue d'Histoire moderne et contemporaine 18 (1971), 375–414; "Histoire du catholicisme moderne et contemporain," Revue Historique CCXLI (1970), 125–48, 387–440; Forces religieuses et attitudes politiques dans la France contemporaine sous la direction de René Rémond. Cahiers de la fondation nationale des sciences politiques 130 (Paris 1965); C. Molette, L'A.C.J.F. 1886–1907 (Paris 1968); P. Huot-Pleuroux, Le recrutement sacerdotal dans le diocèse de Besançon de 1801 à 1960 (Paris 1966); J. M. Mayeur, La séparation de l'Église et de l'État (Paris 1966); M. Villain, L'abbé Paul Couturier, apôtre de l'unité chrétienne (Paris 1957).—Recent bibliography: P. Vigneron, Histoire des crises du Clergé français contemporain (Paris 1976), 427–71.

22. The Church in Spain and Portugal

SPAIN: The number of studies on this period is extensive. The Cuadernos Bibliográficos de la Guerra de España (1936–1939), ed. by Vincente Palacio Atard, alone lists more than two thousand titles. Therefore we must limit our selection to what is absolutely necessary. Works mentioned in the footnotes will not be cited. As sources, a great many articles beyond the Boletines Eclesiásticos can be found in the periodicals Razón y Fe, La ciudad de Dios, La Ciencia Tomista, El Mensajero del Corazón de Jesús, Sal Terrae, Ecclesia, Vida Nueva. Mention must be made of the Guías de la Iglesia de España, yearbooks, and statistics for congresses and meetings. S. Azner, Estudios religiosos-sociales (Madrid 1949); id., La revolución española y las vocaciones eclesiásticas (Madrid 1949); M. Batllori und V. M. Arbeloa, eds., Archivo Vidal y Barraquer. Iglesia y Estado durante la Segunda República Española 1931–1936 (Montserrat 1971); R. Muntanyola, Vidal i Barraquer, cardenal de la pau (Barcelona 1969); J. Lopez and M. B. Isusi, Las religiosas en España. Situación sociologica y renovación litúrgica (Bilbao 1969); J. M. Vazquez, F. Medlin, and L. Mendez, La Iglesia española contemporánea (Madrid 1973); R. Duocastella, J. Marcos, and J. M. Díaz Mozaz, Análisis sociológico del Catolicismo español (Barcelona 1967); J. Rupérez, Estado confesional y libertad religiosa (Madrid 1970); A. Alvarez Bolado, El experimento de Nacional-Catolicismo 1939–1975 (Madrid 1976).

PORTUGAL: Anuário Católico de Portugal (Lisbon 1931, 1932, 1933, 1943, 1947, 1953, 1957, 1968); Portugal e Santa Sé. Concordata e Acordo Missionário (Lisbon 1943); M. de Oliveira, História Eclesiástica de Portugal (Lisbon 1958); Portugal Missionario (Cucujães 1928); F. de Almeida, História da Igreja em Portugal III (Barcelona 1970); D. Peres, História de Portugal (Porto 1954–58); A. H. de Oliveira Marques, A 1ª República Portuguesa (Lisbon, n.d.); Boletim de Informação Pastoral (Lisbon 1959–70); F. Jasmins Pereira, A Primeira República (Braga 1972); Anuário Católico do Ultramar Português (Lisbon 1960, 1964).

23. The Countries of the English-Speaking Areas

BIBLIOGRAPHY

GREAT BRITAIN: D. Barker, G. K. Chesterton. A Biography (New York 1973); G. A. Beck, ed., The English Catholics, 1850–1950 (London 1950); M. V. Brand, The Social Catholic Movement in England, 1920–1955 (New York 1963); W. F. Brown, Through Windows of Memory (London 1946); J. M. Cleary, Catholic Social Action in Britain, 1909–1959. A History of the Catholic Social Guild (Oxford 1961); J. Crehan, S.J., Father Thurston. A Memoir with a Bibliography of His Writings (London 1952); M. Cruickshank, Church and State in English Education, 1870 to the Present Day (London and New York 1964); J. Dingle, Le Catholicisme contemporain en Grande-Bretagne (Paris 1967); G. P. McEntee, The Social Catholic Movement in Great Britain (New York 1927); J. Murphy, Church, State and Schools in Britain, 1800–1970 (London 1971); E. Oldmeadow, Francis Cardinal Bourne, 2 vols. (London 1940–44); G. Scott, The R.Cs. A Report on Roman Catholics in Britain Today (London 1967); F. Sheed, The Church and I (Garden City, New York, 1974); R. Speaight, The Life of Eric Gill (New York 1966); id., The Life of Hilaire Belloc (New York 1966); F. Valentine, O.P., Father Vincent McNabb, O.P., The Portrait of a Great Dominican (Westminster, Maryland 1955); M. Ward, Gilbert Keith Chesterton (New York 1943); id., Return to Chesterton (New York 1952); id., Unfinished Business (New York 1964); E. Waugh, Monsignor Ronald Knox (Boston 1959).

IRELAND: D. H. Akenson, "Education and Enmity," The Control of Schooling in Northern Ireland, 1920–50 (New York 1973); J. Blanchard, The Church in Contemporary Ireland (Dublin 1963); D. Fennell, The Changing Face of Catholic Ireland (London 1968); J. Mescal, Religion in the Irish System of Education (Dublin 1957); D. W. Miller, Church, State and Nation in Ireland, 1898–1921 (Pittsburgh 1973); J. H. Whyte, Church and State in Modern Ireland, 1923–1970 (Dublin 1971).

UNITED STATES: A. I. Abell, "American Catholicism and Social Action," A Search for Social Justice, 1865–1950 (Garden City, N.Y. 1960); C. J. Barry, O.S.B., American Nuncio. Cardinal Aloisius Muench (Collegeville, Minn. 1969); F. L. Broderick, Right Reverend New Dealer, John A. Ryan (New York 1963); H. A. Buetow, Of Singular Benefit: The Story of Catholic Education in the United States (New York and London 1970); L. Curry, "Protestant-Catholic Relations in America," World War I Through Vatican II (Lexington, Ky. 1972); J. T. Ellis, American Catholicism (Chicago 1969); id., Documents of American Catholic History, 2 vols. (Chicago 1967); id., A Guide to American Catholic History (Milwaukee 1959); id., The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore, 1834–1921, 2 vols. (Milwaukee 1952); G. Q. Flynn, American Catholics and the Roosevelt Presidency, 1932–1936 (Lexington, Ky. 1968); L. H. Fuchs, John F. Kennedy and American Catholicism (New York 1967); R. I. Gannon, S.J., The Cardinal Spellman Story (Garden City, N.Y. 1962); P. Gleason, The Conservative Reformers. German-American Catholics and the Social Order (Notre Dame, Ind. 1968); A. Greely, W. C. McCready and K. McCourt, Catholic Schools in a Declining Church (New York 1976); HK 31 (1977), 143–47; F. J. Lally, The Catholic Church in a Changing America (Boston 1962); T. T. McAvoy, C.S.C., Father O'Hara of Notre Dame. The Cardinal-Archbishop of Philadelphia (Notre Dame, Ind. 1967); id., A History of the Catholic Church in the United States (Notre Dame, Ind. 1969); S. Marcus, Father Coughlin. The Tumultuous Life of the Priest of the Little Flower (Boston 1973); M. A. Marty, "Lutherans and Roman Catholicism," The Changing Conflict, 1917–1963 (Notre Dame, Ind. 1968); P. Marx, O.S.B., Virgil Michel and the Liturgical Movement (Collegeville, Minn. 1957); W. D. Miller, A Harsh and Dreadful Love. Dorothy Day and the Catholic Worker Movement (New York 1973); H. J. Nolan, ed., Pastoral Letters of the American Hierarchy, 1792–1970 (Huntington, Ind. 1971); D. J. O'Brien, American Catholics and Social Reform. The New Deal Years (New York 1968); E. J. Power, Catholic Higher Education in America (New York 1972); id., A History of Catholic Higher Education in the United States (Milwaukee 1958); G. Shaughnessy, Has the Immigrant Kept the Faith? A Study of Immigration and Catholic Growth in the United States, 1790–1920 (New York 1925, reprinted 1969); J.

G. Shaw, Edwin Vincent O'Hara, American Prelate (New York 1957); J. B. Sheerin, C.S.P., Never Look Back. The Career and Concerns of John J. Burke (New York 1975); C. J. Tull, Father Coughlin and the New Deal (Syracuse, N.Y. 1965); R. Van Allen, The Commonweal and American Catholicism. The Magazine, the Movement, the Meaning (Philadelphia 1974); E. R. Vollmar, S.J., "The Catholic Church in America," An Historical Bibliography (New York 1963); V. A. Yzermans, ed., American Participation in the Second Vatican Council (New York 1967).

CANADA: D. de Saint-Denis, O.F.M. Cap., L'Église Catholique au Canada. Précis historique et statistique. The Catholic Church in Canada. Historical and Statistical Summary (Montreal 1956); S.M.A. of Rome Gaudreau, "The Social Thought of French Canada as Reflected in the Semaine Sociale," The Catholic University of America Studies in Sociology XVIII (Washington, D.C. 1946); J. Hulliger, L'enseignement social des évêques canadiens de 1891 à 1950 (Montreal 1958); L. K. Shook, College Post-Secondary Education in English-Speaking Canada. A History. Studies in the History of Higher Education in Canada VI (Toronto 1971); Vingt-cinq ans de l'École Social Populaire, 1911–1936 (Montreal 1936).

24. The Church in Latin America

LITERATURE

The great national histories of the individual republics treat church relations only down to the turn of the century. On the twentieth century there are only sketches, for the most part in English. The Church is generally regarded from the point of view of the state or politics. Ecclesiastical historiography in its own right does not exist.

For a survey of the individual republics, see: H. Herring, A History of Latin America from the Beginnings to the Present (New York 1956) or F. Morales Padrón, "Historia de América," Manual de Historia Universal 5–6 (Madrid 1962); Generally reliable are the two editions of J. L. Mecham, Church and State in Latin America (Chapel Hill 1934, 1966), to which may be added F. B. Pike, The Conflict between Church and State in Latin America (New York 1964) and F. C. Turner, Catholicism and Political Development in Latin America (Chapel Hill 1971); an essay-type approach is C. H. Hillekamps, Religion, Kirche und Staat in Lateinamerika (Munich 1966).—For Protestantism in Latin America; P. Damboriena, El protestantismo en América Latina, 2 secs., (Fribourg and Bogotá 1962–63); E. Willems, "Followers of the New Faith," Culture, Change and the Rise of Protestantism in Brazil and Chile (Nashville 1967).—J. Lembke, Christentum unter den Bedingungen Lateinamerikas. Die katholische Kirche vor den Problemen der Abhängigkeit und Unterentwicklung (Berne and Frankfurt am Main 1975); J. Thesing, "Die christlichen demokratischen Parteien in Lateinamerika," HK 31 (1977), 313–18; H. J. Prien, Die Geschichte des Christentums in Lateinamerika (Göttingen 1978); David E. Mutchler, The Church as a Political Factor in Latin America with Particular Reference to Colombia and Chile (New York 1971); Karl M. Schmitt, The Roman Catholic Church in Modern Latin America (New York 1972); Hugo Latorre Cabal, The Revolution of the Latin American Church (Norman 1977).

BRAZIL: M. Barbosa, A Igreja no Brasil. Notas para a sua história (Rio de Janeiro 1945); J. M. Bello, A History of Modern Brazil 1889–1964 (Stanford 1966); E. B. Burns, A History of Brazil (New York 1970); P. F. da Silveria Camargo, História eclesiástica do Brasil (Petrópolis, Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo 1955); J. Alfredo de Sousa Montenegro, Evolução do Catolicismo no Brasil (Petrópolis 1972); T. C. Bruneau, The Political Transformation of the Brazilian Catholic Church (Cambridge 1974); M. Todaro Williams, "Jackson de Figueiredo, Catholic Thinker," TAM (The Americas) 31 (1974), 139–63; P. A. Ribeiro de Oliveira, Catholicismo popular no Brasil (Rio 1970); A. U. Floridi, Radicalismo cattolico brasiliano (Rome 1968); H. Fesquet, Une Église en état de péché mortel (Paris 1968); E. de Kadt, Catholic Radicals in Brazil (London 1970); A. Ghurbant, L'Église rebelle en Amérique Latine (Paris 1969); The question of syncretism is treated in R. Bastide, Les religions africaines au Brésil (Paris 1960); M. Koch-Weser, Die Yoruba-Religion in Brasilien (diss., Bonn 1976); Charles Antoine, Church and Power in Brazil (New York 1973).

ARGENTINA: R. Levillier, ed., Historia argentina V (Buenos Aires 1968); G. Bleiberg, ed., Diccionario de Historia de España, Argentina (Época independiente) I (Madrid 1968), 344–50; J. Vicens Vives, Historia social y económica de España y América. Burguesiá, industrialización, obrerismo IV/2 (Barcelona 1959); J. Alameda, Argentina Católica (Buenos Aires 1935); G. Furlong, L. M. Baliña, G. Ferrer, J. A. Allenfe, L. M. Ardanaz, C. M. Gelly y Obes, and L. Ayarragaray, Etapas del catolicismo argentino (Buenos Aires, n.d.); Historia argentina contemporánea 1862–1930, 4 secs. (Buenos Aires 1963–67); J. A. Paita et al., Argentina 1930–1960 (Buenos Aires 1961); P. Waldmann, Der Peronismus 1943–1955 (Hamburg 1974); P. Marsal S., Perón y la iglesia (Buenos Aires 1955); The position of the Church in the last years is dealt with in: T. T. Evers, Militärregierung in Argentinien (Hamburg 1972); J. J. Kennedy, Catholicism, Nationalism and Democracy in Argentina (University of Notre Dame Press 1958).

PARAGUAY-URUGUAY: E. Cardozo, Paraguay independiente and J. E. Pivel D., Uruguay independiente-Historia de América 21 (Barcelona 1949); Anuario eclesiástico de Paraguay, ed. by the Centro de estudios socio-religiosos (CESR) in collaboration with the Centro de documentación, estudios y proyectos, pastoral social and the Bishops' Conference of Paraguay (1792); Diccionario de historia de España. Paraguay (Época independiente) III, ed. by G. Bleiberg (Madrid 1969), 172–75; Guí de la Iglesia católica en el Uruguay 1973; Diccionario de historia de España. Uruguay (Época independiente) III, ed. by G. Bleiberg (Madrid 1969); J. Vicens Vives, Historia social y económica de España y América. Burguesía, industrialización, obrerismo II (Barcelona 1959).

CHILE: L. Galdames, A History of Chile (Chapel Hill 1941); F. Araneda B., El arzobispo Errázuriz y la evolución política y social de Chile (Santiago de Chile 1956); J. Basadre, "Chile, Perú y Bolivia independientes" (Barcelona and Buenos Aires 1948), Historia de América y de los pueblos americanos, ed., A. Ballesteros y Beretta; Estado de la Iglesia en Chile, ed. by the Oficina Nacional de Estadística de la Acción Católica Chilena (Santiago de Chile 1946); Guía parroquial y guiá eclesiástica de Chile (Santiago de Chile 1969); Diccionario de Historia de España. Chile (Época independiente) I (Madrid 1968), ed. by G. Bleiberg, 1082–1089; J. Vicens Vives, Historia social y económica de España y América, Burguesía, industrialización, obrerismo IV/2 (Barcelona 1959).

BOLIVIA: P. Díaz Machicao, Historia de Bolivia 1920–1943, 5 secs. (La Paz 1954–58); H. S. Klein, Parties and Political Change in Bolivia 1880–1952 (Cambridge 1969); R. J. Alexander, The Bolivian National Revolution (New Brunswick 1958); Anuario eclesiástico de Bolivia para el año del Señor 1960 (La Paz 1960); J. Basadre, "Chile, Perú y Bolivia independiente" (Barcelona and Buenos Aires 1948), Historia de América y de los pueblos americanos, ed. by A. Ballesteros y Beretta; G. Bleiber, ed. Diccionario de historia de Espana. Bolivia (Época independiente) I (Madrid 1968), 557–66.

PERU: J. Basadre, Historia de la República del Perú, 16 secs. (Lima 1968–69); Historia general de los Peruanos hasta 1973, sec. 3 (Lima 1973); J. L. Klaiber, "Religion and Revolution in Peru 1920–1945," TAM 31 (1975), 289–312; id., Religion and Revolution in Peru, 1824–1976, (Notre Dame 1977). From the extensive literature on the Catholicism of the Indians, J. C. Mariátegui, Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana (Lima 1974). Anuario eclesiástico del Perú 1974, Secretariado del episcopado peruano. Departamento de estadística. Arzobispado de Lima, Perú; J. Basadre, "Chile, Perú y Bolivia independientes," Historia de América y de los pueblos americanos, ed. by A. Ballesteros y Beretta (Barcelona and Buenos Aires 1948); Una universidad que crece. La Pontificia Universidad Católica del Perú recibe un donativo de la Fundación Ford (Lima 1965).

ECUADOR: A. Pareja Diezcanseco, Historia del Ecuador, Sec. 2 (Quito 1958); Estudio de la viceprovincia del Ecuador III/1, Estudio del personal; Estudio de las residencias y parroquias 2; Estudio de los colegios de la Compania de Jesús en el Ecuador (Quito 1969), ed. by the CIAS (Centro de Investigación y Acción Social); J. L. Izurieta S.I., La Iglesia en el Ecuador, Estudio del personal de 1968 II/1: Análysis; 2: Estadísticas (Quito 1969), ed. by the CIAS; La Iglesia en el Ecuador 1949. Sinopsis de la jerarquía ecuatoriana y de las Órdenes y congregaciones religiosas (Quito 1949); La Iglesia en el Ecuador 1963. Directorio de la Iglesia católica en el Ecuador, ed. by the Episcopal Secretariat in cooperation with the Bishops' Conference; J. I. Larrea, La Iglesia y el Estado en el Ecuador. La personalidad de la Iglesia en el modus vivendi entre la Santa Sede y el Ecuador (Seville 1954), publication of the School of Spanish-American Studies of Seville, LXXXIII; F. Nuscheler and H. Zwiefelhofer, S.J., Kirche und Entwicklung in Ekuador und Kolumbien, ed. by The Political Association at the Munich College of Philosophy (Mannheim and Ludwigshafen 1972); J. Tobar Donoso, La Iglesia modeladora de la nacionalidad (Quito 1953).

COLOMBIA: Historia extensa de Colombia (Bogotá 1965ff.); G. Guzman et al., La violencia en Colombia, Sec. 2 (Bogotá 1962–64); L. Schoultz, "Reform and Reaction in the Colombian Catholic Church," TAM 30 (1973), 229–50; Conferencias episcopales de Colombia 1908–1953 (Bogotá 1956); Anuario de la Iglesia católica en Colombia (Bogotá 1951); M. Colón, O.S.A., Por la Iglesia, Artículos político-religiosos sobre asuntos de actualidad (Bogotá 1910); Conferencia episcopal de 1948 (20 June–3 July) (Bogotá 1948); J. M. Fernández, S.J., and R. Granados, S.J., Obra civilizadora de la Iglesia en Colombia (Bogotá 1936); R. Gómez Hoyos, La Iglesia en Colombia. Postura religiosa de López de Mesa en el escrutinio sociológico de la historia colombiana (Bogotá 1955); G. de Ibarra, O.M.Cap., La religión católica en el concordato de Colombia (Assisi 1939); G. Jiménez Cadena, S.J., Sacerdote y cambio social. Estudio sociológico en los Andes Colombianos (Bogotá 1967), in the series of the Centro de Investigación Acción Social, CIAS 2; F. Nuscheler and H. Zwiefelhofer, S.J., Kirche und Entwicklung in Ekuador und Kolumbien (Mannheim and Ludwigshafen 1972); J. Vicens Vives, Historia social y económica de España y América. Burguesía, industrialización, obrerismo IV/2 (Barcelona 1959).

VENEZUELA: M. Picón Salas et al., Venezuela independiente 1910–1960 (Caracas 1962); N. E. Navarro, Anales eclesiásticos venezolanos (Caracas 1951); Directorio de la Iglesia católica en Venezuela 1975, ed. by the Centro de investigaciones en ciencias sociales (CISOR), Departamento de estadísticas y documentación, Secretariado permanente del episcopado venezolano (SPEV), Caracas; V. Iriarte, S.J., La arquidiócesis de Venezuela 1962, ed. by the Secretariado permanente del episcopado venezolano, Caracas; R. E., Venezuela (Época independiente), Diccionario de historia de España, III, ed. by G. Bleiberg (Madrid 1969), 954–63; J. Vicens Vives, Historia social y económica de España y América. Burguesía, industrialización, obrerismo II (Barcelona 1959).

ANTILLES: E. Williams, "From Columbus to Castro," The History of the Caribbean 1492–1969 (London 1970); R. Guerra Sanchez et al., Historia de la nación Cubana, Secs. 8–10 (Havana 1952); R. W. Logan, Haiti and the Dominican Republic (London 1968); under the same title, The Era of Trujillo, P. L. Gonzáles Blanco (Santo Domingo 1955) and J. De Galíndez (Santiago de Chile 1956); On Voodooism, A. Métraux, Voodoo in Haiti (New York 1959), id., Religion and Politics in Haiti (Washington 1966).

CENTRAL AMERICA: F. D. Parker, The Central American Republics (London 1964); M. P. Holleran, Church and State in Guatemala (New York 1949).

MEXICO: J. Bravo Ugarte, Historia de México III. México II. Relaciones internacionales, territorio, sociedad y cultura (Mexico 1959); D. Olmedo, S.J., "Mexico, Modern" New Catholic Encyclopedia IX (1966), 775–83; México. Diccionario de Historia de España, ed. by G. Bleiberg, II (1968), 1033–54. "Uber die Zeit der Revolution und ihre Cristero-Phase jetzt," J. Meyer, La révolution mexicaine 1910–1940 (Paris 1973); H. F. Cline, Mexico: Revolution to Evolution 1940–1960 (London 1962); J. Meyer, The Cristero Rebellion 1926–1929 (Cambridge 1976); D. C. Bailey, Viva Cristo Rey. The Cristero Rebellion and the Church State Conflict in Mexico (Austin 1974); E. Portes Gil, The Conflict between the Civil Power and the Clergy (Mexico 1935) and García Gutiérrez, Acción anticatólica en Méjico (Mexico 1959) reflect both parties in the conflict; Robert E. Quirk, The Mexican Revolution and The Catholic Church 1910–1929 (Bloomington 1973).

For the present situation of the Church in Latin America, the work edited by C. Veliz, Latin America and the Caribbean: A Handbook (London 1968) is a good introduction. The documentation for the Second Latin American Bishops' Conferences of Medellín of 1968 is available in Iglesia y liberacíon humana (Barcelona 1969) and Revista Javeriana 70 (Bogotá 1968).

In September of 1974 upon the initiative of Padre Dr. Enrique Dussel there was founded in El Salvador the Comisión de Estudios de Historia de la Iglesia en America Latina, CEHILA. The History of the Church planned by the commission is to have ten volumes, divided according to regions, and encompass the period from 1492 to the present.

25. The Young Churches in Asia, Africa and Oceania

SOURCES AND LITERATURE

Acta Apostolicae Sedis (AAS) 1940–78; A. Reuter, O.M.I., Summa Pontificia (Regensburg 1978); J. Glazik, M.S.C., Päpstliche Rundschreiben über die Mission von Leo XIII. bis Johannes XXIII. (Münsterschwarzach 1961); E. Marmy and I. Auf der Maur, Geht hin in alle Welt. Missionsenzykliken der Päpste Benedikt XV., Pius XI., Pius XII., und Johannes XXIII. (Fribourg 1961); Streit-Dindinger, Bibliotheca Missionum (BM), continued by P. J. Rommerskirchen, O.M.I., and P. M. Metzler, O.M.I., XXII–XXIII; XXVII (Mission Literature of India 1910–46); XXVIII (Mission Literature of South Asia [India, Pakistan, Burma, Ceylon] 1947–68); XXIX (Mission Literature of South Asia 1910–70): XXX (Mission Literature of Japan and Korea 1910–70); J. Rommerskirchen, O.M.I., Bibliografia Missionaria XIII–XLI; Bibliografia Missionaria (Supplement): Quaderno n. 1–20, Documenti e problemi missionari; J. Beckmann, S.M.B., Weltkirche und Weltreligionen. Die religiöse Lage der Menschheit (Freiburg 1960); T. Scalzotto, "I Papi e la Sacra Congregazione per l'Evangelizzazione dei Popoli o 'de Propaganda Fide' da Benedetto XV a Paolo VI," Sacrae Congregationis de Propaganda Fide Memoria Rerum. 350 Jahre im Dienste der Weltmission 1622–1972 III/2 (Freiburg 1976), 253–302; J. Metzler, O.M.I., "Präfekten und Sekretäre der Kongregation in der neuen Missionsära" (1918–1972), loc. cit., 303–53; A. Reuter, O.M.I., "De nova et novissima S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide ordinatione a Summis Pontificibus S. Pio X et Paulo VI instaurata," loc. cit., 354–81; B. Jacqueline, "L'organisation interne du dicastère missionnaire après 350 ans," loc. cit., 382–412; G. Zampetti, S.D.B., "Le Pontificie Opere Missionare," loc. cit., 413–49; A. Seumois, O.M.I., "La S.C. 'de Propaganda Fide' et les études missionnaires," loc. cit., 450–63; J. Metzler, O.M.I., "Tätigkeit der Kongregation im Dienste der Glaubensverbreitung 1922–1972. Ein Überblick," loc. cit., 464–577; W. Bühlmann, O.F.M.Cap., "Epilogo. Passato e futuro della evangelizzazione," loc. cit., 578–614; J. Metzler, O.M.I., "L'organizzazione dell'attività missionaria," Via Verità e Vita. Rivista Catechistica XVI (Rome 1968), 79–88; G. B. Reghezza, La Cooperazione Missionaria (Rome 1977); "Sacra Congregazione per l'Evangelizzazione dei Popoli o 'de Propaganda Fide,'" Annuario 1976 (Rome 1977); id. Annuario 1977 (Rome 1978); T. Scalzotto, ed., La Sacra Congregazione per l'Evangelizzazione dei Popoli nel Decennio del Decreto "Ad Gentes," (Rome 1975).

INDEX

Adam, Karl 265, 306, 468
Adélaïde, Marie 561
Adenauer, Konrad, West German chancellor 535, 548
Adult education 384, 395f, 399–403, 623, 648, 721
Africa 203, 476, 777, 793
—charities 446
—education 405ff
—orders 329, 359f
—radio, Catholic 431ff, 434f
Africanization 778f
Agagianian, Gregorio Pietro XV, cardinal 31, 116, 142
Age limit 120
Albania 530
—orders 375
—Orthodox Church 490
Alberione, Giuseppe 571
Alessandri, president of Chile 697
Alexander III, patriarch of Antioch 477
Alexis, patriarch of Moscow 484, 485, 492ff
Alexius, patriarch of Moscow 104, 116
Alfrink, Bernard, cardinal, archbishop of Utrecht 103, 111, 120, 124, 161, 455, 568
Algeria 230, 782
Allamano, Giuseppe 571
Allende, president of Chile 672, 698
Alphonso XIII, king of Spain 601, 604
Altaner, Berthold 282
Alvarado, Juan Velasco 706
Ambrosios, catholicos 478
Andrej, metropolitan 495
Andrieux, Joseph, cardinal 588
Anglican Church, Anglicans 103, 458f, 469, 472, 615, 619f, 631, 718f, 780, 792f, 796, 800
Angola 230, 788f
Anizan, worker-priest 597
Apartheid policy 781
Arámburu, Juan Carlos, auxiliary bishop of Buenos Aires 688
Arcel, Alfred 334
Argaña, Bogarín, bishop 692
Argentina 685–90
—bishops' conference 689f
—Church and state 219f
—clergy 687f
—orders 330
—postconciliar development 686
Arnold, Franz Xaver 290
Arrupe, Pedro, general S.J. 142
Ascalesi, Alessio, cardinal, archbishop of Naples 576
Asia 150, 203, 446, 794
Associations, Catholic 65f, 69, 71, 401, 536, 540, 547
Athanasius, Greek Church Father 477
Athenagoras, ecumenical patriarch 125, 475, 496
Auer, Alfons 335
Australia 795, 804
—charities 446, 455f
—orders 330
Austria 549–52
—Austrian Marxism 549
—Catholic Action 28
—charity 454
—Church and National Socialism 551
—clergy 337
—clergy, opinion survey 347
—concordat 185, 218f, 551
—diocesan synods 163
—education 402
—press, Catholic 418
—private schools, Catholic 552
—publicity 412
—state and Church 552
—television 428f
—theology 286
Ayala, Ángel, S.J. 611
Aznar, Severino 603

Bacht, Heinrich, S.J. 283
Bailly, Vincent de Paul 419
Balbo, Felice 580
Baldrelli, Ferdinando 451f
Balthasar, Hans Urs von 330, 335, 336, 347
Baltic states 507f
Bangladesh 768, 769
Bantu tribes 781
Barelli, Armida 581
Barnabas, patriarch 480

Barone, Domenico 52
Baronio, Cesare, cardinal 97f
Barreto, Vincente, S.J. 692
Barth, Karl 461
Baschir, Anton, exarch 477
Basileios, abuna 501
Basileios, bishop 494
Basileios Paul II, Mar 499
Basileios III George II, Mar, catholicos 498
Basileios IV Eugene I, catholicos 498
Basileios V Matthew I, Mar 499
Batista, Fulgencio, president of Cuba 723
Baudrillart, Henri Marie Alfred, cardinal 42, 584
Bäumker, Clemens 266
Baumstark, Anton 282
Bayer, Karl 451
Bea, Augustin, curial cardinal 33, 101ff, 111ff, 118, 122ff, 127f, 133, 286, 469
Beauduin, Lambert, O.S.B. 300, 560, 657
Belaúnde, president of Peru 706
Belgium 22, 92, 557–60, 783
—Catholic Action 308, 558
—Catholic education 557
—charities 443, 452, 455
—church life 559
—clergy 558
—education 389f, 393, 397
—liturgical movement 299
—Louvain, Catholic university 397, 561
—mariology 318
—organization, social 557
Bell, G. K., bishop 628
Belloc, Hilaire 624
Beloch, historian 30
Bendiscioli, Mario 581
Benedict XV, pope 21f, 35, 153, 584–86
Benoit, P. 285
Beran, Josef, cardinal 136, 519f
Beras-Rojas, Octavio Antonio, cardinal 729
Bergen, Diego von 256
Bergson, Henri 747
Bertram, Adolf, cardinal, archbishop of Breslau (Wroclaw) 25, 28, 76, 303, 534f, 537, 544f, 550
Bethmann Hollweg, Theobald von 42f
Bevilacqua, Giulio 577, 581
Biafra 785
Bible (Scriptural studies, Bible movement) 32, 111, 123, 129, 133, 140, 172, 262, 271, 283–88, 294, 305f, 355, 560, 581
Billot, Louis, cardinal 589
Birth control 2f, 135, 144f, 630, 642, 667, 718
Bishops, College of 93f, 113, 117f, 126, 131, 136, 173
Bishops' synods (bishops' councils) 117, 119, 125, 136, 149, 160, 167, 173f, 344f, 347, 688f, 700, 708, 722, 729
Bismarck, Otto von, prince 585
Blake, Eugene Carson 463
Blanco, Rafael Arías, archbishop 719
Blanshard, Paul 659
Blondel, Maurice 277, 284
Bolivia 701–705
Boniface VIII, pope 37
Bonnet, George 592
Bopp, Léon 290
Bormann, Martin, Hitler's secretary 543
Botswana 790
Bouillard, Henri 269
Boulart, Abbé 596, 599
Bourne, Francis, archbishop 616, 624, 629f, 631
Brandts, Max 442
Brazil 673–84
—Catholic Action 675
—Catholic education 680
—Catholic press 681
—church life 675–80
—clergy 674ff, 682, 683
—development, postconciliar 683
—Episcopal Conference 674
—Indian missions 684
—orders 330
—sects 681
—state and Church 204
Bremond, Henri 265, 596
Brent, Charles 459
Breslin, Thomas 256
Breviary 26, 109, 124
Briand, Aristide 229, 585
Brinktrine, Johannes 278
Britten, James 629
Browne, Michael, cardinal 117, 639, 640
Browne, Noel 640
Brown, William Francis 617
Bruce, William George 665
Brüning, Heinrich, German chancellor 301
Buddhism 769f, 775
Bugarini, V. 97
Bukatko, Gabriel, coadjutor archbishop 121
Bulgaria 97, 463, 529f
—orders 375
—Orthodox patriarchate 479f
—persecution of Church 530
—religious policy 201
Bultmann, Rudolf 271f, 285, 287
Buonaiuti, Ernesto 573
Burke, John 644
Burma 774
Burundi 783, 785f
Butler, R. A. 619

Calles, Plutarco Elias, president of Mexico 742
Camacho, Manuel Ávila 744
Câmara, Jaime Barros, cardinal 682
Cameroon 779f, 791
Cambodia 774
Campoamor, José María 713
Canada 667–71, 787
—charity 441, 451, 456f
—education 398, 668ff

—hierarchy, Catholic 668
—population, Catholic 667
—social movements 670f
Canon law 151–77
Canonizations 23, 27, 29, 32, 171, 587, 792
Cape Verde Islands 787
Caraman, Philip, S. J. 631
Caravias, José 693
Carbone, Vincenzo 104
Cárdenas, Lázaro, president of Mexico 743
Cardijn, Joseph 289, 309, 558, 589
Carli, Luigi, bishop 113, 118, 127
Carmona, António de Fragoso, Portuguese dictator 186
Caroline Islands 797
Carraro, Giuseppe, bishop 138
Caretto, Carlo 583
Casariego, Mario, archbishop 740
Casel, Odo, O.S.B. 267, 297
Castaña bishop 606
Castelnau, Edouard de, general 587
Castillo, Lucas Guillermo, archbishop 719
Castro, Fidel 698, 700, 723, 724ff
Castro, Juan Bautista, archbishop 719
Cathedral chapter 155, 193, 536
Catholic Action 28, 29, 55–58, 156, 254, 262, 289, 307ff, 338, 537, 558, 575, 577f, 589f, 608, 610, 613, 663, 675, 695, 697, 730, 739, 744f, 766
Cavour, Camillo Benso, count 576
Ceausescu, Nicolae 526
Celibacy, of priests 118, 126, 143, 148, 154, 171, 337, 341f, 347f, 372, 568, 696, 722
Cento, Fernando, cardinal 112, 124, 141
Central Africa 783
Ceretti, Bonaventura, nuncio 47, 586
Cerfaux, Lucien 560
Cesbron, Gilbert 333
Ceuppens, F. 285
Ceylon 769
Chad 791
Chardin, Teilhard de 269, 399
Charities 436–58
Charles, Raphael 560
Charles I, emperor of Austria 42
Charlotte, grand duchess of Luxemburg 561
Charrière, François, bishop 112
Chesterton, Gilbert Keith 625
Chevrier 329
Chiaudano, Giuseppe 412
Chignoni, Alessandro 573
Chile 697–701
—orders 329f
China 28, 753, 755
—education 398
—Orthodox Church 493
—orders 377
Choren, catholicos 502
Choren, catholicos of Cilicia 504
Christopher, archbishop 490
Christopher II, patriarch 476
Chrysanthius, archbishop 490
Chrysostom I 489f
Chrysostom II, archbishop 490
Church, hierarchical structure 117, 157
Church and state 209–217, 229–59, 371–77, 693
Churchill, Winston, British prime minister 86
Church music 110, 157, 297, 302ff, 657, 720
Čičerin, Georgij, Russian foreign minister 62
Cicognani, Amleto Giovanni, cardinal 112, 113, 121
Cieplak, John, archbishop 510
Ciriaci, Pietro, nuncio 102, 158, 518
Clark, Mark 660
Clemenceau, Georges Benjamin, French statesman 585f
Colgan, Harold von 319
College of Cardinals 10, 17f, 26, 28, 31f, 35, 115, 120, 135, 149, 155, 159, 168, 173, 238, 248, 546, 754, 765, 777ff
Colonialism 773f, 777, 780
Colombia 712–19
—arrangement with Vatican 199
—concordat 219
—state and Church 207
Colombo, Carlo, cardinal 581
Comboni, Daniele 571
Communism (Communist parties) 60, 86, 124, 128, 144, 200, 202, 207, 231, 248ff, 375ff, 381 (school system) 415 (press), 462, 482, 484f, 487, 493, 505, 514, 519f, 522, 579, 583, 592, 636, 652, 654, 659, 682, 697, 706, 714ff, 724f, 740, 753f, 761, 771
Comoro Islands 792
Comte, Auguste 588
Concentration camps 374, 484, 544
Conclave 22, 25, 30, 33, 35, 99, 115, 154, 159, 173
Concordats 31, 127, 177–228, 372, 380, 387, 417, 417, 447, 507f, 514, 524f, 527, 533f, 540, 545, 547f, 583, 586, 591, 609, 635, 728
—with Italy 52f, 54–59
Confalonieri, Carlo, cardinal 26, 113
Conforti, Guido Maria 571
Confirmation, sacrament of 157, 165
Congar, Yves, O.P. 129, 141, 268, 335, 468, 596
Congo 778, 783f, 791
Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples 796, 803
Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith 751ff, 758, 763, 770, 777, 779, 783, 785, 786, 795
Conzález, Felipe Rincón, archbishop 719
Cook Islands 797
Cort, John 654
Cosgrave, William T. 635f
Couglin, Charles E. 652f, 658f
Crane, Paul, S.J. 626
Crispi, Francesco, Italian minister 576
Crivelli, G., director of Swiss Caritas 450

Croce, Benedetto 582
Crowley, Patrick 664
Csernoch, János, cardinal 522
Cuba 723–27
Cullmann, Oscar 108
Curia, Roman
—organization 10–18, 99, 101ff, 108, 116, 153, 155, 302f, 466, 644
—reform of 119, 136, 147f, 167f, 172, 357, 371
Cushing, Richard, cardinal 662
Cyprus 408, 488f
Cyril, abuna in Ethiopia 501
Cyril, patriarch of Bulgaria 479
Cyril III, archbishop of Cyprus 488
Cyril V, patriarch of the Copts 499
Cyril VI, patriarch of the Copts 499
Czechoslovakia 516–20
—celibacy law 154
—charity 450
—Church, national 516f
—Church, Orthodox 493f
—negotiations with Vatican 517f
—orders 375
—religious policy, communist 519
—state and Church 184, 202f
Daem, bishop of Antwerp 139
Damaskinos, archbishop of Athens 490
Damian, archbishop 490
Damianos, patriarch of Jerusalem 477
Dander, Franz 265
Daniel, Yvan 331
Daniêlou, Jean, cardinal 268, 335, 596
Dante, Heinrich, archbishop 110
Darmo, Thomas, bishop 497
David V, catholicos of Georgia 478
Dawson, Christopher 628, 631
Day, Dorothy 626, 653
De Gasperi, Alcide 54, 575–80
De Gaulle, Charles, French general and statesman 86, 98, 594
De Hueck, Catherine 650
De la Bédoyère, Michael 632
De Lai, Gaetano, cardinal 644
Delaney, John, S.J. 663
Delehaye, Hippolyte 282
Della Chiesa, Mario 21, 35
Della Torre, Giuseppe 577
Delp, Alfred, S.J. 375
Del Portillo, Alvaro 358
De Luca, Giuseppe 581
Demetrios, metropolitan of Belgrade, patriarch 480
Demetrios I, metropolitan 475
De Montfort, Louis Marie Grignion 640
Denifle, Heinrich, O.P. 282
Denmark 505
Denominational schools 185, 191ff, 193, 218, 225f, 393, 536, 585, 646, 668
—see Religious instruction
Deschanel, French president 585
De Smedt, Emile Joseph, bishop 111, 113, 122, 127, 132, 136
De Valera, Eamon 634ff
Development aid 776, 790, 793, 797, 800, 804
Dey, James, Msgr. 625
Dezza, Paolo, S.J. 351
D'Herbigny, Michel, S.J., bishop 510
Diaconate 119, 126, 134, 171, 703f, 730
Dibelius, Martin 285
Dignan, John, bishop 639
Diekamp, Franz 264
Dilthey, Wilhelm 263
Diocesan synods 99, 103, 159f, 161f (Common Synod of the German bishoprics), 162 (Austria and Switzerland), 338 (Cologne), 556, 582 (Rome)
Dionisij, Polish metropolitan 492
Dionysius VI, Indian metropolitan, catholicos 498
Djibouti 783
Doerner, August, pastor 303
Dölger, Franz-Josef 282f
Dollfuss, Engelbert, Austrian federal chancellor 550f
Döllinger, Joseph Ignaz 261
Dominican Republic 727–30
Doncoeur 587
Donders, Adolf 294
Döpfner, Julius, cardinal, archbishop of Munich-Freising 105, 109f, 113, 116, 130, 137, 143, 345, 549
Dorotej, metropolitan of Czechoslovakia 493
Dositej, Macedonian archbishop 491
Dossetti, Giuseppe 581
Drexel, Katherine 650
Driesch, Hans 263
Dubček, Alexander, Czechoslovakian prime minister 493
Dubois, Louis Ernest, cardinal, archbishop of Paris 589
Duchesne, L. 281
Duff, Frank 319
Dumeige, G. 283
Duschak, bishop, vicar apostolic of Calapan 110

Eastern Churches 102, 112f, 121, 131, 134f, 172, 175, 183f, 201, 459, 461f, 467, 473–531
Eberle, Joseph 412
Ecuador 708–12
Ecumenism, general 27, 100, 102, 111, 121f, 125f, 132, 140, 165, 268f, 319, 402, 458–73, 474, 480, 484, 489, 491, 504, 718, 785, 804
—Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity 16, 101ff, 112, 128, 133f, 159, 171, 176, 469f
Education 28, 55ff, 139, 180, 181, 220, 264, 378–409, 590, 593f, 601, 602, 616–23,

637, 647, 668, 691, 701, 704f, 709, 713, 721, 772, 774, 794
Egenter, Richard 275f
Egypt 474, 476, 499f, 789f
—education 383, 409
Ehrhard, Albert 24, 26, 281
Ehrle, Franz, cardinal 24, 26, 282
Elchinger, Arthur, bishop 139, 144
Elias IV, patriarch of Antioch 477
Elizabeth I, queen of England 616
Ellard, Gerald, S.J. 657
El Salvador 736–38
England, see Great Britain
Entralgo, Laín 601
Epagneul 597
Ephraem II, catholicos of Georgia 478
Episcopal conferences 24, 73, 76, 108f, 114, 119f, 124, 136f, 138, 150, 160, 163f, 166, 173, 175, 344, 351, 386, 404, 413, 442, 453f, 527, 534, 543f, 548, 550, 553, 569, 583, 594, 609, 635, 643, 645, 673, 677, 679, 682, 684, 689, 692f, 697, 700, 703, 706f, 710, 714, 717, 718, 733, 736, 741, 752, 765, 776, 791, 794, 796, 802
Ermecke, Gustav 275
Erzberger, Matthias, German minister 45
Esch, Ludwig, S.J. 311
Eschweiler, Karl 264, 278
Escrivá de Balaguer, J. M. 328, 357, 610
Ethiopia 499ff, 789f
Eucharistic Congresses 28, 135, 522, 673, 695, 712, 717, 766, 795f
Eugenios, archbishop of Crete 491
Evening Mass 157
Evreinhoff, Alexander, Msgr. 89

Fascism 253f, 308, 559, 574–80, 591
—see Mussolini, Lateran Treaties
Faulhaber, Michael, cardinal 25, 73f, 79, 255, 294, 532, 534, 535
Felici, A., pronuncio 568
Felici, Pericle, cardinal 102, 173
Feltin, Maurice, cardinal 109, 333
Ferrata, Domenico, cardinal 22f
Ferrini, Contardo 24
Figueredo, Sergio, S.J. 729
Fiji Islands 798
Filaret, metropolitan of North America 495
Finland 507
—Orthodox Church 429f
Fisher, Desmond 632
Fisher, Geoffrey Francis, archbishop of Canterbury 103
Fitzsimons, John P. 626
Fliche, Augustin 596
Fonck, Leopold, S.J. 284
Fogarty, Michael P. 624
Ford, John 626
Foucauld, Charles de 326, 355f, 367
France 92, 98, 583–600
—Action Française 589, 592
—bishops' conference 120
—care of souls 588f
—Catholic Action 309
—charities 437
—Church, Protestant 459
—Church and state 178, 185f, 204, 585f
—clergy 344f, 598f
—council participants 109
—ecumenical ideas 468
—education 389f, 393, 397, 591
—nationalism 588
—orders 358
—press, Catholic 419f
—public 413
—schools 595
—situation under Benedict XV 583–86
—situation under Pius XI 586–91
—situation under Pius XII 592–600
—theology 261, 263, 265, 268, 275, 596f
—worker-priests 331–35, 339, 597ff
—world war 584ff, 592ff
Franco, Francisco, Spanish chief of state 86, 199, 217, 373
Franič, Franjo, bishop of Split 113, 126, 129
Franzelin, Johannes Baptist 21
Frascati, Pier Giorgio 572
Freedom of conscience 61, 247
Frings, Josef, Cardinal, archbishop of Cologne 32, 108ff, 117, 120, 124, 127, 128, 142, 453ff, 546, 549
Fröbel, Friedrich 390
Fröhlich, Cyprian 442
Frondizi, Argentine president 686
Funk, Franz Xaver 570

Gabriel V, patriarch of Serbia 480f
Gabon 785, 790
Galen, Clemens August von, bishop of Münster, cardinal 32, 73, 76, 545
Gallagher, Michael James, bishop 652
Gambia 780, 791
Gardeil, A., O.P. 264, 277
Garegin, catholicos of Cilicia 503
Garofalo, Salvatore 581
Garrigou-Lagrange, Réginald 265, 278
Garrone, Gabriel, cardinal 144
Gasparri, Pietro, cardinal, secretary of state 22, 25, 30, 46, 48–52, 62, 151, 154, 254, 291, 526, 574
Gedda, Luigi 583
Geiselmann, Joseph Rupert 111, 271
Gemelli, Agostino 573, 581
Gentile, Giovanni 254, 582
Gentiloni, Italian diplomat 573
Gerlier, Pierre Marie, archbishop 124, 334, 589, 593
German, patriarch of Serbia 481, 491
Germany, Federal Republic of 31, 79ff, 85, 87, 88ff, 251, 253ff, 531–49
—assistance from abroad 545
—bishops' conference 120, 534, 549
—Catholic Action 537f

—charities (Caritas) 436ff, 441f, 447f, 451, 453, 457
—Church and National Socialism 62–77
—Church, Protestant 459
—clerical opinion survey 347
—clergy 338, 341, 344, 351
—concordat 540, 551
—concordats (state) 533, 535
—Eastern policy, Vatican 549
—ecumenical movement 460, 463, 468
—education 380, 390f, 394, 397, 400ff
—film 414
—Jews 545f
—liturgical movement 300f
—marriage laws 152
—nunciature 546
—orders 321f, 373f
—organizations 307f
—organizations, Catholic 536
—press, Catholic 416ff, 425ff
—prohibition of party politics for priests 548
—publicity 411ff
—reconstruction 547
—religious policy, National Socialist 540f
—state and Church 190–98, 220–28
—synods 161–66
—television 428f
—theology 260ff, 268, 275, 277f, 284, 285, 290
German Democratic Republic 226f, 556
—charity 450
—Pastoral Synod 162, 557
Gestido, Oscar, president of Uruguay 694
Geyer, Bernhard 266
Ghana 779f
Ghellinck, J. de 266
Gibbons, James, cardinal 660
Gijsen, Johannes Matthijs, bishop 569
Gil, Emilio Portes, Mexican president 743
Gilbert Islands 799
Gill, Eric 624
Gilson, Étienne 263, 596
Giolitti, Giovanni 48, 573
Giordani, Igino 575
Glattfelder, Gyula, bishop 522, 524
Gnocchi, Carlo 580
Godfrey, William, archbishop 616
Godin, H. 289, 331
Goebbels, Joseph, German minister of propaganda 542f
Goettsberger, J. 284
Gomes da Costa, Portuguese general 612
Gomulka, Władysław, Polish prime minister 515
Gonner, Nicholas E. 665
Gosling, Samuel 630
Grabmann, Martin 24, 266
Gracias, Valerian, cardinal 110, 463
Great Britain 86, 88, 614–32
—charities 455
—education 389, 391
—education, Catholic 616–22
—hierarchy, Catholic 615
—instruction, religious 629f
—liturgical movement 630
—population, Catholic 614
—press, Catholic 419, 631f
—publicity 411
—social movement 622–29
—YMCA 458
Gregory (I) the Great, pope 331
Gregory VII, pope 37
Gregory XVI, pope 410
Greece 92, 97, 475
—education 408
—Orthodox Church 489f
Griffin, Bernard, archbishop 616, 629
Gröber, Konrad, archbishop of Freiburg 65f, 303f
Grosche, Robert 468
Grösz, József, archbishop 523
Grundmann, Siegfried 226
Guaggiari, José 690
Guano, Emilio, bishop 130
Guardini, Romano 262, 294f, 298, 301f, 305, 306, 317
Guatemala 739ff
Guérin, Abbé 589
Guevara, Ché 698
Guinea 785
Guinea-Bissau 787f
Gummersbach, J., S.J. 264
Gundlach, Gustav, S.J. 240, 246, 252f, 256
Gunkel, Hermann 285
Gut, Benno, O.S.B., abbot 126
Gutiérrez, Augustín 714
Gwynn, Denis 631

Hadrian VI, pope 117
Haiti 199
Hardt, Feliz 412
Häring, Bernhard 130, 275
Harnack, Adolf von 281
Hartmann, Felix von, cardinal 532
Hartmann, Nicolai 263
Hayes, Carlton J. H. 660
Hayes, John 638
Hayes, Patrick, archbishop 656
Heenan, John, archbishop 112, 128, 132, 616
Heidegger, Martin 263, 266, 608
Heinen, Anton 400
Heinen, Wilhelm 275
Heinisch, Paul 285
Hélder Pessoa Câmara, archbishop 682
Helmsing, Charles Herman, bishop 132
Hengartner, Meinrad 455
Hengsbach, Franz, bishop of Essen 128, 141
Hermaniuk, Maxim, Ukrainian metropolitan 132
Herriot, Édouard 587
Hertling, Georg von, count, imperial chancellor 24
Herwegen, Ildefons, O.S.B., abbot 301

Hess, Rudolf 322
Hessen, Johannes 263
Heydrich, Reinhard, chief of the Gestapo 543
Hilarion, metropolitan of the Ukrainian-Greek Orthodox Church in Canada 496
Hildebrand, Dietrich von 263
Himmler, Heinrich, Nazi politician 543
Hinduism 768
Hinsley, Arthur, archbishop 616, 618, 628f
Hitler, Adolf 63–68, 69, 73, 74ff, 82, 86f, 194, 196, 255, 375, 536, 538–42, 579
Hlond, August, cardinal 514, 546
Hobson, John A. 651
Hochhuth, Rolf 78, 93
Hoeck, abbot 135
Hoffman, Hermann 469
Höffner, Joseph, cardinal, archbishop of Cologne 144, 347
Holland, see Netherlands
Honduras 734–36
Hong Kong 803
Hoover, Herbert, president of the United States 642, 651
Hörle, Georg Heinrich 302
Hornyak, Augustine Eugene O.S.B.M., apostolic exarch 615
Horthy, Miklós, regent of Hungary 521
Hostie, Raymond 323
Howard, Henry 616
Hoxha, secretary general of the Albanian Communist Party 490
Hoyt, Robert 665
Hromadka, Joseph 462
Huidobro, Fernando, S.J. 608
Hume, Basil, cardinal 616
Hummelauer, F. von, S.J. 284
Hungary 520–23
—celibacy law 154
—charities 443
—Church, Orthodox 493
—Jews 94
—marriage laws 152
—orders 376
—relations with the Holy See 214
—religious policy, Communist 522f
—religious revival 521f
—Treaty of Trianon 521
—World War II 81, 91
Husserl, Edmund 267
Huyn, Paul, count, archbishop 517

Ibáñez, president of Chile 697
Ignatius XXXVIII Ephraem, patriarch of Antioch 497
Ignatius XXXIX Jacob III Severus, patriarch of Antioch 498
Illiteracy 793
Imperialism 803
India 497–502, 763, 765
Indochina 771
Indonesia 773f
Innitzer, Theodor, cardinal 550–51
Innokentij, Orthodox archbishop in China 494
Internunciatures 754, 762, 768
Iran 497, 503
Iraq 497
Irenej, Orthodox archbishop of New York 495
Ireland 632–41
—Catholic population 632
—charities 443, 456
—Church and state 217, 635f
—education, Catholic 637f
—hierarchy 635f
—lay apostolate 640f
—political development 633ff
—social movement 638ff
Islam 122, 125, 215, 379, 383, 406, 407f, 499f, 501, 526f, 791
Israel 131, 477, 504
Italy 31, 79f, 84f, 89f, 569–83
—Catholic Action 308, 577
—charities 449, 451
—clerical opinion survey 347
—concordat 217f
—council participants 136
—culture 581
—education 390
—education of priests 569f
—episcopal conferences 120
—Fascism 575–80
—Lateran Treaties 576
—orders 358, 571
—parties, Christian 580
—postconciliar period 583
—press, Catholic 421ff
—religious situation 582
—state and Church 187ff, 204, 254
—theology 99
—university, Catholic 581
Ivory Coast 791

Jacob III, patriarch of the Jacobites 139
Jacobs, Konrad 302
Jaeger, Lorenz, cardinal, archbishop of Paderborn 103, 122, 469
Japan 80f, 757, 761
—education 399
—orders 329
—Orthodox Church 494
—television 429
Jarrett, Bede, O.P. 631
Jaspers, Karl 263, 266
Jedin, Hubert 283
Jelevferij, archbishop and exarch 493
Jerome, archimandrite 490f
Jerzy, metropolitan of Poland 493
Jewish persecution 58, 64, 90–95, 122, 127f, 131, 139, 160, 522, 545, 579, 593, 642, 652, 658
Joann, metropolitan of Prague 493

Joasaph II, patriarch of the Copts 499
John XIX, patriarch of the Copts 499
John XXIII, pope 96–151, 209
Jong, Johannes de, cardinal 562
Joseph, exarch in Bulgaria 479
Jungmann, Josef Andreas, S.J. 265, 292, 294, 315f
Jürgensmeier, Friedrich 274, 306
Justin, patriarch of Rumania 488
Justinian, patriarch of Rumania 488f

Kaas, Ludwig 33, 65, 73, 538
Kallistratos, catholicos of Georgia 478
Kassiepe, Max 303
Keegan, Patrick 129, 626
Kehr, Paul 24, 27
Kennedy, John F., American president 659
Kentenich, Josef 319, 329
Kenya 779, 782, 794
Keough, John W. 649
Keppler, Paul Wilhelm, bishop of Rottenburg 294, 337
Kerby, William J. 443
Kerrl, Hanns, German minister 197, 543
Kevork V, catholicos of Echmiadzin 502
Kevork VI, catholicos of Echmiadzin 502
Kirsch, Johann Peter 282
Klauser, Theodor 282
Koch, Joseph 266
Köhler, Oskar 283
Kolb, Viktor 412
Kolbe, Maximilian 319, 375, 514, 515
König Franz, cardinal, archbishop of Vienna 111, 128, 144, 249
Könn, Joseph 302
Kopp, Georg, cardinal 532, 537
Korea 761f
Kramp, Joseph, S.J. 301
Kraus, Franz Xaver 570
Krestinski, Nicolai, Russian ambassador 62
Kreutz, Benedikt, president of Caritas 447
Krofta, Kamill, Czechoslovak ambassador 517
Kruschev, Nikita 249, 484
Kurth, Godefroid 300
Kuss, Otto 285

Labor unions 67, 562, 588, 589, 603, 622, 627, 640, 651, 654, 670, 697, 702, 705, 707, 712, 714, 744
Lafontaine, Peter, patriarch of Venice 25
LaFarge, John, S.J. 256, 656f
Lagrange, Marie Joseph 284, 286, 306
Lais, Hermann 279
Lakner, F. 265
Lambertini, Prospero, later Benedict XIV, 23f
Landersdorfer, Simon Konrad, O.S.B., bishop 303
Landgraf, Arthur-Michael 266
Landrieux, A., bishop 293
Lang, Albert 278
Langbehn, Julius 262
Lanzoni, Angelo 26
Laos 773
Laros, Matthias 468
Larraona, Arcadio, cardinal 110, 126, 362
Lateran Treaties 27, 30, 47–59, 68, 80, 187, 204, 308, 576f
Latin, as language of the Church 103, 107, 109, 123, 631
Latin America 150, 189, 672–74
—charities 453f
—clergy 345
—council participants 110, 138
—education 378, 387f, 398, 403ff
—lack of priests 121
—orders 358, 360
—radio, Catholic 430ff, 435
—state and Church 189
Latvia 507
—concordat 183
Law books (ecclesiastical) 100, 114, 137, 142, 147, 151f, 154, 158 (Eastern), 158, 173–77, 179f, 353, 412
Lay apostolate 118, 125, 126, 129, 133, 141f, 143, 147, 156, 164, 170, 177, 299, 309, 319, 329, 348, 357, 438, 464, 477, 498, 537, 572, 575, 611, 623, 626f, 630, 635, 637–41, 649, 655, 663f, 665f, 674, 679, 682f, 689, 692, 696, 699, 702, 707, 722, 732, 737, 740, 771, 795
League of Nations 46f
Lebanon 497, 503
Le Bras, Grabriel 596
Lebreton, J. 306
Leclercq, J. 276
Lefebvre, Marcel, bishop 352
Le Fort, Gertrud von 338
Léger, Paul Émile, cardinal 118, 127, 132, 143
Leiber, Robert, S.J. 33, 63, 66
Leme, Sebastião, cardinal 675f
Lemke, William 659
Lemoneyer, A. 285
Lence, Germán 725
Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich 740
Leo XIII, pope 28, 114, 152, 231f, 235, 238, 243, 248, 299, 327, 354, 398, 422
Leontios, bishop of Paphos 489
Lercaro, Giacomo, cardinal 109, 116f, 128, 130
Leslie, Shane 631
Lesotho 781, 785
Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis 177
Liberia 790
Lieber, Ernst 412
Liénart, Achille, cardinal 108, 113, 118, 589
Lilje, Hanns, bishop 461
Lithard, V. 289
Lithuania 508f
—clergy 509
—concordat 184, 202
liturgical movement 109, 123, 262, 289,

296f, 299–305, 312, 338, 355, 560, 568, 609, 630, 657, 779, 791
Logue, Michael, cardinal 633
Loisy, Alfred 284
Lokuang, Stanislaus, cardinal 110
Lombardi, Riccardo, S.J. 99, 324, 682
Longo, Bartolo 572
López de Lama, Jesús Agustín, bishop 703
Lortz, Joseph 466, 468
Loew, Père Jacques, worker-priest 334, 597
Lubac, Henri de 268, 270, 596
Lucey, Cornelius, bishop 639
Lutherans 492, 506f, 521, 792
Luxemburg 443, 560

Macarius III, patriarch of the Copts 499
McGowan, Raymond A. 651
McGrath, Marcos Gregorios, archbishop 731
McIntyre, James Francis, cardinal 110
Mackintosh, Donald A., archbishop 627
McNabb, Vincent, O.P. 625
McQuaid, John Charles, archbishop 638, 639
Madagascar 779, 782, 792, 794
Maffi, Peter, cardinal 22, 25
Maglione, Luigi, cardinal, secretary of state 31, 34, 115, 303
Magón, Flores 741
Maier, F. 285
Maier, Hans 212
Majláth, Gusztáv, bishop 582, 524
Makarij, Polish metropolitan 492
Makarios II, archbishop of Cyprus 489
Makarios III, archbishop of Cyprus 489f
Malaku Walda Michael, patriarch of Ethiopia 502
Malaysia 770, 775
Mali 791
Malvy, French minister of the interior 584
Manna, Paolo 571
Manrique, Jorge, archbishop 702
Manton, Martin T., judge 660
Maréchal, Joseph 261
Marella, Paolo, nuncio 119, 333, 597
Marianas 797
Marian devotion (Mariology, Legion of Mary) 27, 34, 127, 134, 269, 309, 318–21, 608, 683, 701, 720, 735, 749, 766, 772
Mariategui, José Carlos 706
Marín Sola, F., O.P. 267
Maritain, Jacques 263, 596, 609
Marmion, Columba, abbot of Maredsous 264
Marquesas 797
Marriage law 53, 58, 130, 152, 156, 157, 171f, 175, 185, 196, 200, 217, 579, 583, 605, 608, 637, 664, 686f, 706, 728
Marriage sacrament 130, 157, 188
Marshall Islands 797
Martil, Germano 351
Martin, Josef Maria, archbishop 121, 132
Marty, François, cardinal 143
Marx, Karl 252, 740, 741
Marx, Wilhelm 538
Mass book 123, 170, 300f
Mass media (television, press, radio) 31, 80, 108, 111, 124, 224, 235f, 410–36, 501, 542, 547, 562, 565, 569, 571, 611, 613, 631f, 652, 663, 665, 666, 681, 687, 705, 731, 733, 735, 739, 766f, 788, 803
Masure, M., 278
Matteotti, Giacomo 576
Maura, Antonio, Spanish politician 604
Maurer, Gheorge 526
Maurer, José Clemente, cardinal 704
Maurin, Peter 626, 653
Maurras, Charles 588f, 592
Mausbach, Joseph 272
Mazzolari, Primo 581
Maximos, patriarch of Bulgaria 480
Maximos IV, patriarch 112, 128
Méchineau, L. 284
Medrano, Luis, S.J. 731
Mehmed V Resad, sultan 39
Meinertz, M. 285
Melchisedek, metropolitan 495
Melchisedek III, catholicos of Georgia 478
Mellos, bishop 497
Melville, Arthur, M.M. 740
Melville, Thomas, M.M. 740
Mena Porta, Juan José Anibal, archbishop 691
Mercati, Giovanni, cardinal 27
Mercier, Désiré, cardinal 22, 25, 300, 397, 532, 557
Merkelbach, B. 273
Merkle, Sebastian 281
Merry del Val, Raphael, cardinal 22, 25, 31, 572
Mersch, E. 274, 306
Merz, Hans-Peter 455
Metzger, Max Joseph 469
Mexico 741–50
—hierarchy, Catholic 745f
—orders 372
—pastoral care 745f, 748–50
—persecution 28, 237, 741–44
—piety, forms of 748f
Meyenberg, A. 272
Meyer, Albert Gregor, cardinal 128, 130, 132
Meyer, Augustinus, O.S.B. 351
Michaelis, Georg, imperial chancellor 42ff
Michel, Virgil, O.S.B. 657
Michoneau, worker-priest 597
Milani, Lorenzo 581
Military chaplains 205, 219, 607, 612
Mindszenty, József, cardinal 249, 523f
Miron, patriarch of Bucharest 487
MISEREOR 803
Mission direction 790
Mission methods 795
Mission patronate 764
Missions 110, 114, 129, 141f, 147f, 154ff, 181, 199, 207, 282, 341, 358f, 379, 380,

405f, 431, 446, 453, 459, 463, 465, 477, 560, 563, 571, 608, 613, 632, 662, 666, 684, 701, 704, 713, 719, 722, 745, 803
Mixed marriages 122, 130, 135, 146f, 171, 721
Modernism 98, 269, 281, 332, 337f, 381, 570
Mohlberg, C., O.S.B. 282
Momme Nissen, B., O.P. 262
Montero, Antonio 605
Montessori, Maria 390
Montini, Giovanni (later Paul VI) 34, 89f, 103, 109, 113, 214, 422, 577
Monzón, Uberfil 692
Mooney, Edward, archbishop 653
Morocco 782
Mörsdorf, Klaus 137
Moscati, Giuseppe 572
Mott, John R. 458
Mounier, Emmanuel 596
Mozambique 787ff
Mstyslav, metropolitan of the Ukranian Orthodox Church in Exile 496
Muench, Aloysius, nuncio 547
Múgica, Mateo, bishop 606
Müller-Simonis, Paul 445
Münckner, Theodor 275
Mundelein, George William, cardinal, archbishop of Chicago 75, 653, 658
Murri, Romolo 337, 572f
Muslims 771, 792, 799, 802f
Mussolini, Benito 49f, 51–58, 81, 85–88, 91, 189, 229, 253, 574–79

Namibia 782
Nasalli-Rocca di Corneliano, Giovanni, cardinal 579
Nasser, Gamal Abdel, Egyptian president 500
National Churches 514f, 526, 755
National Socialism 253ff, 268, 283, 294, 304, 322, 330, 373ff, 416, 447, 468, 514, 522, 538, 541, 545, 551, 591f, 628, 661
—see Hitler, Race theories, Reich, Concordat with the National synods 770, 788
Natural law 232
Naumann, Johann Wilhelm 425
Necchi, Vico 572
Nell-Breuning, Oswald von, S.J. 251f
Neo-Scholasticism 260
Netherlands 561–69
—Catholic press 423f
—Catholic radio 430
—charities 455, 457
—church crisis 568f
—clergy 344, 566
—clergy, opinion survey 347
—disintegration (1960–70) 564–69
—flowering (1919–60) 561–64
—orders 367
—Pastoral Council 160ff, 567
—rise of Catholicism 564
—teaching and preaching 567
—theology 275
—training of priests 567
Netzhammer, Raimund, O.S.B. 524
Neuss, Wilhelm 283
Neutrality (of the papacy and Church) 23, 35, 37, 79ff
New Caledonia 798, 800
New Guinea 776, 799–803
New Hebrides 799
New Zealand 795f, 804
Nicaragua 733f
Nicholas II, Russian tsar 481
Nicholas V, patriarch 476
Nicholas VI, patriarch 476
Nigeria 779f, 785
Nikel, J. 286
Nikodim, metropolitan of Leningrad and Novgorod 485
Nikodim, metropolitan of Moldavia 487
Nikoly, metropolitan 485
Nikoly, metropolitan of Japan 494
Noldin, H., S.J. 273
Noll, John Francis, bishop 664
Nommesch, bishop of Luxemburg 561
Noppel, C. 289
Norris, James J. 130
North America 388–403
North Korea 377
North Solomon Islands 801
Norway 371, 506
Nunciatures (nuncios, apostolic delegates) 11, 20, 21, 24f, 29, 30, 170, 199, 512, 518f, 522, 526, 528f, 533, 547, 553, 568, 586, 594, 616, 635, 673, 674, 746?, 743, 756, 761f, 766, 768ff, 776f, 784, 801

O'Boyle, Patrick A., archbishop 656
Oceania 795f, 804
O'Connell, William, cardinal 652
O'Dea, Thomas, bishop 634
O'Dwyer, Edward Thomas, bishop 633f
O'Grady, John 443, 451
O'Hara, Edwin, bishop 647, 655
O'Hea, Leo, S.J. 623
Ohm, Thomas, O.S.B. 453
Oldmeadow, Ernest 631
Oliva, Francisco de Paula, S.J. 692
O'Rahilly, Alfred 639
Oraison, Maurice 275
Orders 324, 355–378, 621, 699, 810, 812
Oria, Ángel Herrera, cardinal 611
Orione, Luigi 571
Orlando, Vittorio Emanuele, Italian premier 48f, 576
Ortega y Gasset, José 602f, 747
Osborne, ambassador 81
O'Shaughnessy, Michael 653
Osservatore Romano 41, 72, 81, 85, 100, 422f, 577, 592, 652, 681, 708
Ottaviani, Alfredo, cardinal 102, 109, 111, 113, 117, 120, 127, 140

Otto, Rudolf 264
Ozanam, Frédéric 439

Pacelli, Eugenio (later Pius XII) 29, 31, 42–46, 49, 62, 64f, 75, 533, 535f, 591
Pacelli, Francesco 52
Paganuzzi, Ettore 572
Paisios, archbishop of Albania 490
Pakistan 383, 409, 765, 768
Pallavicino, Pietro S., 146
Panama 730ff
Papal election—see Conclave
Papen, Franz von, German vice-chancellor 64f, 540
Paraguay 690–694
Parecattil, J., archbishop of Ernakulam 175
Parental right 139, 382f, 386, 543, 591, 619f, 645, 659
Parente, Pietro, cardinal 110, 118, 126
Parsch, Pius 286, 302
Pascher, Joseph 290
Pastor, Ludwig von 282
Pastoral theology 288–98
Pasqualina, sister 34
Patriarchate (patriarchs) 19, 98, 104, 107, 112, 116, 125, 135, 145, 473–504, 511, 527
Patronate Church 802
Paul VI, pope 159, 209
Paavali, archbishop of Finland 492
Pázmány, Péter, cardinal 522
Peace efforts (of the pope and others) 39–47, 82–88, 94, 114, 236, 256ff, 591, 660
Peeters, Paul 282
Pellegrino, Michele 581
Pepén y Solimán, Juan Félix, bishop 729
Pérez, Roa, archbishop 722
Perón, Juan Domingo 685f
Perrin, Henri, S.J. 332
Peru 705–8
Pétain, Philippe, French marshal 86, 593, 594
Pfliegler, Michael 292
Philips 126, 128, 133
Phillipines 429, 802
Pichler, J. 292
Piffl, Gustav, cardinal 25, 550
Piłsudski, Józef, Polish president 24
Pimen, patriarch of Moscow 485
Pio, Padre 581
Piontek, Ferdinand, vicar capitular 546
Pius IV, pope 148
Pius IX, pope 299
Pius X, pope 11, 37, 98, 229, 284f, 299f, 312f, 337, 352, 572f, 586, 674, 733
Pius XI, pope 23–29, 47, 59, 155, 586–91
Pius XII, pope 29–34, 77–96, 157, 158, 361, 592–600
Pizzardo, Joseph, cardinal 60
Plater, Charles 623
Pla y Deniel, Enrico, cardinal, archbishop of Toledo 607
Plenary council 765f, 771, 795
Plojhar, Josef 519
Pluralism 211, 235, 242, 246f, 268, 339, 365, 415, 424, 554, 561, 565, 580, 582, 675, 804
Podrecca, journalist 576
Poels, Heinrich 563
Pohlschneider, Johannes, bishop of Aachen 386
Poland 24f, 87, 91, 463, 512–16
—Catholic Action 28
—charities 443, 450
—Church, Orthodox 492
—church life 512f
—church struggle 513f
—clergy 339
—concordat 183, 512
—Eastern policy, Vatican 515
—orders 377
—press, Catholic 427
—relation to Holy See 215
—religious policy 201
—state and Church 197
Portugal 611–14, 764, 787
—Catholic Action 28
—development, postconciliar 613f
—Church and state 186, 204, 217
—church life 613
—Concordat 198f
—film 415
—Marian devotion 318
—press 613
—religious instruction 612f
—revolution, anticlerical 611f
Portuguese patronate 765
Potter, Philip 465
Poucel, V. 335
Prat, Flavian 285
Press, see Mass media
Preysing, Konrad von, cardinal, bishop of Berlin 32, 73, 76, 544f
Pribilla, Max, S.J. 468
Price, Thomas F. 662
Priestly office 129, 143, 149, 155, 165
Priests 674, 688, 693, 704, 771, 780
Priests, seminaries (education of priests) 62, 129, 138, 336, 349ff, 362ff, 477, 483f, 487, 490ff, 495, 497, 502, 507, 513, 567, 569, 597, 612f, 673, 675, 676, 683f, 712f, 727f, 738, 744, 746, 760, 767, 771, 786f, 791, 798, 801
Priests, shortage 121, 127, 339, 481, 520, 673, 712, 720, 729, 737, 800, 802
Primatesta, Francisco Raúl, cardinal 690
Primo de Rivera, Spanish general 604
Pro, Augustinus, S.J. 372
Prohászka, Ottokár, cardinal 522
Prümmer, D. M. 273

Race, theory of (racism) 58, 74, 139, 255, 403, 407, 464f, 471, 535, 577f, 652, 655f, 787

Rademacher, Arnold 468
Radini Tedeschi, Giacomo Maria, bishop 97, 572
Rahner, Hugo, S.J. 265, 311, 320
Rahner, Karl, S.J. 129, 271, 291, 320
Ramazotti, Angelo 571
Ramírez, Pedro P. 685
Rampolla, Mariano, cardinal, secretary of state 21f
Ratti, Achille, nuncio (later Pius XI) 23f, 49, 77, 512
Ratzinger, Joseph 141f, 146, 151
Rauschen, G. 570
Reed-Lewis, William 629
Redwood, Vernon 630
Reich, concordat with the (1933) 63–69, 70f, 191, 195ff, 223
Religious instruction 61f, 183, 187, 188, 190, 198, 206, 227f, 380, 409, 479, 481, 499, 519, 543, 551, 557, 561, 567, 573, 578, 593, 609, 628, 641, 647, 677, 681, 685f, 704, 730, 735
Réunion 792
Révai, József, Hungarian minister 376
Rhodesia 785f
Rimmer, Gerard 626
Rites question 753, 758, 759, 763
Ritter, Joseph Elmer, cardinal 109, 128, 132, 656
Ritter, Xaver, nuncio 519
Roberti, Francesco, cardinal 104
Robinson, Paschal, nuncio 635
Robles, Gil José María 604f
Rodano, Franco 580
Roncalli, Angelo, nuncio (later John XXIII) 96f, 388, 530, 594
Roos, Christian 442
Roosevelt, Franklin D., American president 81, 85, 651, 658, 659f
Ropp, Eduard von, archbishop 510
Rosa, Gabriele de 580
Rosary 98, 594, 684
Rossi, Mario 583
Rotta, Angelo, nuncio 522
Rousselot, P. 261, 278
Rubin, Ladislaus 150
Ruffini, Ernesto, cardinal 127, 138
Rugambwa, Laurean, cardinal 110, 120
Ruíz, Echevarría, archbishop 711
Ruiz y Flores, Leopoldo, apostolic delegate 743
Rumania 93, 94, 463, 523–26
—Eastern policy, Vatican 526
—church life 525
—church policy 201, 524
—church and state 203
—concordat 184, 202, 524
—patriarchate, Orthodox 486ff
Rummel, Joseph F., archbishop 657
Russia, see USSR
Ruanda 783
Ryan, John A. 650ff, 659, 660
Sacred Heart devotion 28, 32, 315
Sacrament of matrimony 130, 157, 188
Salazar, Oliveira, president of Portugal 198, 612
Salcedo, José Joaguín 431
Saliège, Jules Geraud, archbishop 593
Salvadori, Giulio 572
Samoa 798, 800, 804
Samorè, Antonio, cardinal 673
Sandwich Islands 797
Sangier, Marc 337
San Martín, Ramón, Cuban president 723
Santucci, Carlo 50f
São Tomé 787
Sarech I, catholicos of Cilicia 504
Sarpi, Paolo 146
Scandinavia 505
Schachleiter, Alban 373
Scheeben, Matthias Joseph 261, 272
Scheler, Max 263
Schenucha III, patriarch of the Copts 500
Schilling, Otto 273, 274
Schirach, Baldur von, Nazi youth leader 543
Schlink, Edmund 104
Schmaus, Michael 265, 320
Schmidlin, Joseph 282
Schmidt, Karl Ludwig 285
Schmitz Sauerborn, German, auxiliary bishop 708
Schneider, Joseph, archbishop 130
Schöllgen, Werner, 275
Schools, see Education
Schott, Anselm, O.S.B. 300
Schrembs, Joseph, bishop 644
Schulte, Karl Joseph, cardinal, archbishop of Cologne 25
Schulz, A. 286
Schuman, Robert, French foreign minister 301
Schuster, Alfredo Ildefonso, cardinal, archbishop of Milan 56, 116, 577, 579
Schütte, Johannes, S.V.D. 142
Second World War 67–96, 177, 198, 769, 771, 774f, 806f, 797, 799
Secular institutes 33, 158, 326–31, 355–58, 760, 767
Seipel, Ignaz 538, 550
Selassie, Haile, emperor of Ethiopia 501
Semmelroth, Otto, S.J. 320
Senegal 773, 790
Seppelt, Franz Xaver, 282
Seraphim, archbishop 490
Serbia 480f
Serédi, Jusztinián, cardinal 518, 522
Sergius, patriarch of Moscow 483
Sertillanges, Antonia Gilbert, O.P. 263, 585
Seychelles 792
Shahan, Thomas 443f
Sheed, Frank 630
Sickenberger, Joseph 284, 285
Sierra Leone 780

Simeon, bishop of Shanghai 494
Simon XX Paul, patriarch of the Nestorians 496
Simon XXI Jesse, patriarch of the Nestorians 497
Simonis, Adrian, bishop of Rotterdam 569
Siri, Giuseppe, cardinal 118
Sixtus V, pope 10, 11, 18, 115, 148
Slater, Theodor 273
Slipyi, Josyf, metropolitan 512
Smith, Alfred 658
Smith, Matthew J. W., Msgr. 664
Snead-Cox, John George 631
Snoeck, A. 275
Socialism 59, 200, 213, 231, 248–53, 415, 538, 549f, 561f, 573, 576, 603, 624, 688, 699, 714, 741, 743, 791
Society Islands 797
Söderblom, Nathan 458, 460, 467
Soiron, Theodor, O.F.M. 265
Solomon Islands 799ff
Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr 213
Sotelo, José Calvo, Spanish politician 605
South Africa 779, 781, 785
Southern Rhodesia 782
South Solomons 801
Soviet Union, see USSR
Spain 92, 600–611
—agencies, ecclesiastical 610f
—Alphonso XIII 601–4
—Catholic Action 28, 610
—charities 443, 451, 456
—Church and state 199, 204–8, 211, 216
—Civil War 605ff
—clerical opinion survey 347
—education 218, 393, 397
—episcopal conference 609
—Liturgical movement 305
—orders 357f, 372
—persecution 237, 605f
—press, Catholic 421f
—syndicalism, Christian 603f
Spellman, Francis Joseph, cardinal 81, 105, 111, 113
Spiritual Exercises Movement 310
Sproll, Johann, bishop 544
Staffa, Dino, archbishop 110, 118
Stalin, Joseph 84, 87, 463
Statistics, ecclesiastical 1–21
—Africa 777
—Argentina 685
—Belgium 558
—Brazil 674, 676f
—Buddhism 757
—Canada 667
—charities 439f, 445f, 457
—China 753f
—Colombia 712
—Cuba 723
—Czechoslovakia 516
—Dominican Republic 728
—Eastern Churches 479f
—Eastern Europe 507f, 512f
—Ecuador 708
—education 378
—El Salvador 736
—France 588f
—Gabon 790
—Great Britain 614
—Honduras 734
—Hungary 521
—India 768
—Ireland 632
—Italy 569, 580, 582
—Japan 760
—Kenya 782
—Korea 763
—Madagascar 792
—Mali 791
—Mexico 744f
—Mozambique 788
—Netherlands 563
—Nigeria 780
—Nyasaland 783
—Oceania 799
—orders 479f
—Panama 730
—Paraguay 691
—Peru 705
—Poland 516
—press 415f
—Ruanda 783
—Rumonia 525
—Samoa 798
—schools 393f
—South Korea 762
—Spain 606f
—Uruguay 694
—Venezuela 719
—Yugoslavia 529
State, secretariat of (secretary) 16, 22f, 30, 52, 86, 89, 115, 148, 170, 249, 591
Stefan, metropolitan of Poland 493
Stegmüller, Friedrich 282
Stein, Edith 375
Stelzenberger, Johannes 275
Stepinač, Aloysius, cardinal 249, 528
Stieglitz, Heinrich 293
Stocchiero, G. 289
Stohr, Albert, bishop of Mainz 303
Stojadinović, Milan 528
Stojan, exarch of Bulgaria 483
Stolz, Anselm, O.S.B. 265
Storr, Rupert 310
Stourm, René Louis, archbishop 112, 124
Stresemann, Gustav, German foreign minister 229
Stroessner, Alfredo 691
Sturzo, Don Luigi, Italian politician 50, 54, 574f
Stutz, Ulrich 194
Subercaseaux, Valdés, bishop 700

Subsidiarity, principle of 149, 174, 232, 239, 242–46, 382, 438
Sudan 779, 783ff
Suenens, Josef Léon, cardinal 111, 113f, 116, 118, 130, 137, 455
Suhard, Emmanuel Célestin, cardinal 286, 331f, 596f
Sulu Archipelago 803
Swaziland 781, 790
Sweden 391, 507
Switzerland 81, 552f
—charities 443, 449ff
—clerical opinion survey 347
—diocesan synods 163
—education 389f
—orders 330, 371
—press, Catholic 419f

Tacchi-Venturi, Pietro, S.J. 50, 578
Tahiti 800
Taiwan 755f
Tanganyika 779, 782
Tanzania 792
Tardini, Domenico, cardinal, secretary of state 34, 86f, 100, 113
Taylor, Myron C. 81, 87, 659
Teusch, Josef, vicar general 453
Thailand 774
Theodosius VI, patriarch of Antioch 477
Theological faculty 791
Theophilos I, patriarch of the Copts 501f
Thérèse of Lisieux 336
Thils, Gustave 335
Third world (developing nations) 230, 241, 259, 379, 428, 453, 456, 689
Thomas Aquinas 363
Tien, Thomas, cardinal 31
Tikhon, patriarch of Moscow 482, 492, 494
Tillmann, Fritz 274f, 286, 294, 306
Timoteusz, metropolitan in Poland 493
Timotheos, patriarch of Jerusalem 477
Tiso, Josef, Slovakian statesman 519
Tisserant, Eugène, cardinal 27, 116, 132, 138, 341
Tito, Josip Broz, Yugoslavian chief of state 480f, 528f
Tixeron, J. 266
Togo 779f
Toher, Michael 640
Tonga 800
Tongelen, Josef, president of Caritas 445
Toniolo, Giuseppe, sociologist 572
Torrado, Oswaldo Dorticós, president of Cuba 723
Torres, Camilo 698
Tóth, Tihamér, bishop 582
Trent, Council of 80, 104, 107, 116, 118, 129, 134, 140f, 146f, 151, 152, 313f, 602
Trials, morals charges 75, 374
Tromp, Sebastian, S.J. 110
Trueba, Andrés Martínez 694
Truman, Harry, American president 660
Tunisia 215
Turkey 98, 497, 503
Turner, Thomas W. 655

Uganda 782, 785f, 792f
Unemployment 229, 626, 724
United Nations 629, 756
Universities 23, 25, 100, 139, 156, 206, 283, 380, 384, 389, 395–99, 404, 421, 442, 447, 468, 490, 513, 551, 558, 559f, 562, 570, 578, 581, 596f, 609, 611, 614, 622, 632, 638, 648, 651, 666ff, 669, 680, 686, 691, 699, 701, 706f, 713, 716f, 720f, 726, 733, 739, 747, 757, 766, 772, 786, 803
Upper Volta 779, 791
Urbani, Giovanni, cardinal 136
Uruguay 330, 694ff
Urundi 783
United States of America 86, 498, 503, 642–67, 756, 761, 797
—charities 441f, 449, 451, 456, 659–63
—clergy 348
—clerical opinion survey 347
—council participants 109, 131
—ecclesiastical policy 658–60
—ecumenism 472–73
—education 378, 381, 387ff, 390, 394f, 397, 402
—education, Catholic 645–50
—episcopal sees 154
—film 414
—hierarchy, Catholic 643f
—lay movements 663–64
—liturgical movement 305, 630, 657–58
—orders 367
—Orthodox Church 494f
—population, Catholic 641f
—postconciliar development 667
—press, Catholic 664–67
—publicity 412
—social movement 650–57
—television 429
USSR 28, 80, 86f, 89, 179, 254, 463, 497, 509–12
—catholicate of Echmiadzin 502f
—Church and state, separation of 509
—Eastern policy, Vatican 512
—education 392, 396
—Marian devotion 318
—measures against the clergy 509f
—orders 375
—Orthodox Church in Georgia 478f
—papal assistance mission 510
—patriarchate of Moscow 481–86
—persecution, Catholic 237
—religious freedom, denial of 466
—religious policy 200, 215
—Vatican 59–63

Valeri, Valerio, nuncio 594
Vallainc, Fausto 108
Vanistendael, August 455

Vannutelli, Vincenzo, cardinal 30
Vanrell, Bartolomé, S.J. 692
Van Roey, Joseph Ernst, cardinal 557
Varnava, patriarch 528
Varona, Graciano, O.S.B. 729
Vasgen, catholicos 503
Vassilij, metropolitan of Poland 493
Vatican I (First Vatican Council) 101, 104, 106f, 116, 118, 122, 126, 131, 133, 146, 152, 260, 439
Vatican II (Second Vatican Council) 96–151, 158ff, 209ff, 364–71, 382–88, 553ff, 613, 696, 752, 755, 760, 767f, 770, 779, 788, 800
Vaz, Alfonso J. Alfonzo 721
Vélez, José María 721
Venezuela 719–23
Verdier, Johannes, cardinal 589
Vianney, Jean Baptiste Marie 329
Vicent, Antonio, S.J. 603
Victor, exarch of Peking 494
Victor Emmanuel III, king of Italy 49, 88
Vidal y Barraquer, Francisco, cardinal 606
Vietnam 230, 771
—clergy 339
—education 409
Vikentij, patriarch of Serbia 481
Villalba, Leónidas Proaño, bishop 710f
Villalobar, Spanish diplomat 45
Vogels, H. J. 285
Voillaume, René 355
Volk, Hermann, cardinal, bishop of Mainz 144

Walsh, James A. 662
Walsh, Robert P. 626
Ward, Maisie 630
Ward, Wilfrid 631
Waters, Vincent, bishop 656
Wellhausen, Julius 285
Welte, Bruno 278
Welykyi 112
Wernz, Franz Xaver, S.J. 24
Werthmann, Lorenz, 442f, 444
Willam, Franz-Michel 306
Willebrands, Johannes, cardinal 104, 469
Willmann, Otto 292
Wilpert, Joseph 282
Wilson, Woodrow, American president 45, 660f
Wojtyla, Karol, archbishop of Cracow (later Pope John Paul II) 128
Wolker, Ludwig 301f
Woodruff, Douglas 631
Worker-priests 338, 597f
Wulf, Maurice de 266
Wust, Peter 263, 299
Wyszyński, Stefan, cardinal, archbishop of Warsaw 112, 136, 215, 249, 515f

Youth movement 262, 289, 301
Yugoslavia 526–29
—Catholic Action 28
—Catholic press 427
—charities 443
—church persecutions 528
—concordats 185, 527
—orders 376
—situation since 1970 529
—state and church 202, 526
—relations with the Holy See 214
Yuhana Mar Thomas, metropolitan of the reformed Jacobites 499

Zaire 779, 783f, 786
Zambia 787
Zamora, Niceto Alcalá, president of Spain 604